Electric Connections.—Cincinnati, Ohio, asks for diagrams showing how to make connections (electric) to an Edison machine. There is no necessity for diagrams; the matter is altogether too simple. If you are using rheostats for resistance, just run one of the wires directly from the main operating switch to one of the binding posts of the lamp. Next run from the other operating switch pole to one binding post of the rheostat and from the other rheostat binding post to the other lamp binding post—and there you are. That is all there is to it, if it be alternating current. If, however, it be direct current then you must light your lamp and let it burn a few moments. If the top carbon gets hottest and the lower one burns to a smooth point, you are all right. If, on the other hand, the lower carbon burns rough and ragged and gets hotter than the upper it is necessary that you change the wires, connecting the one you now have on the lower binding post to the upper and vice versa. If it is alternating current you must put the lamp adjustment handle in the hole marked "A"; if direct current it must be at "D." These letters you will find on side of Edison lamp. If you use a transformer (economizer, compensarc, inductor, etc.), just run your wires from operating switch to transformer, one wire to each post marked "Line." Next connect the posts marked "Lamp" with the lamp, using asbestos covered, No. 6, flexible cable. It matters nothing at all which wire you attach to upper or lower binding post. Use No. 6 wire for all these connections. It may be larger than you will actually need, but it will prove economy in the long run.

The Shutter.—Charleston, S. C., asks what principle is involved in the shutter of a moving picture machine. What I understand him to mean is, "what is the action of the shutter in relation to the movement of the film?" It is amazing how few operators really understand this. If they did they could accurately set any shutter in two minutes' time. It is simply that: The shutter must cover the aperture, or very nearly cover it, during the entire time the intermittent is in motion, and no longer. That is all there is to the action of the shutter.

Ghost on the Screen.—Denver, Col., asks what is the matter with a machine which shows a travel ghost (white streaks shooting up or down from letters in printed titles or other matter—that is to say, it shows most clearly in printing) all the time, regardless of how the shutter be set. If it is impossible to eliminate the ghost by moving the shutter, then the shutter is too short (narrow) and you should rivet a piece of metal on one side. Be very certain first, however, that you cannot get the streaks out by carefully moving the shutter. The surest test is: If when you are experimenting with the shutter you find that at one point the streaks shoot both up and down (at the same time), then it is certain that the shutter is too narrow.

Theater Lighting.—Petersburg, Va., writes in part as follows: "Kindly advise me as to the best system of lighting a moving picture theater without affecting the picture. I have used the green globes, but they are not satisfactory on account of the color burning off too rapidly."

The green globes may be had in green glass, though such lamps are considerably more expensive. In using open white lamps two things must be guarded against, viz.: The light rays striking directly on the curtain and the rays shining directly into the eyes of the audience. There are two practical methods of overcoming these difficulties, viz.: Using ground glass globes over the plain glass and protecting them in front so that even the rays from the ground glass will not directly strike the curtain, or using plain white ceiling globes, set in deep "funnel" cones made of metal, so designed that the rays of one row will overlay those of the next on the floor. On page 484, October 9, 1909, issue, will be found, about half way down second column, method of lighting aisles, also matter pertaining to theater lighting. I believe the Chicago Stage Lighting Company, Chicago, Ill., sell a globe coloring dye which they guarantee.

Distance of Throw.—Columbus, Ohio, asks how much stronger the light will have to be for a 110-foot throw to give same brilliancy as is obtained at 75 feet. Practically no more light is required, provided the size of the picture be not increased. Not so strong if size of picture be decreased. Given reasonably clear atmosphere, there is no appreciable loss of light through even 100 feet additional throw. Many claim, the writer included, that the result is actually better at the longer distance by reason of the long distance lens being of better quality. See article on another page for more detailed explanation.

Amperage.—"Chicago" wants to know how much overload a 25 ampere meter will stand without injury. That is a thing which varies not only with different makes of machines but with each individual meter. Usually a 25 per cent. overload for a limited time will be all right. Better consult the light company before overloading their instruments—always.

Getting Even Focus.—Boston, Mass., says he has trouble keeping his picture in focus. It will be in perfect focus at one point and without the lens being changed at all will be clear out at another, the blur being usually in the center, with edges clear. This would indicate a worn aperture plate. Machines with thin, limber tension springs have a tendency to wear a hollow in the aperture plate tracks opposite the opening, or perhaps two hollows with a hump between. In passing through this the film is cupped and thrown out of focus. It may not be out of focus at all times since different portions of the same film may be of varying stiffness and one part may be, therefore, more easily cupped than another. Get a new aperture plate if yours is worn. If not, write me again and I will go further into the matter, but I believe you will find my surmise of a worn plate to be correct.

Carbons.—St. Louis, Mo., asks what is really the best size carbons to use with direct current. Five-eighths cored above and ½ inch solid below, being careful not to get your solid carbons too hard, else the light will have a tendency to be yellow. Many operators still cling to ⅝ above and below, but with properly selected ½ inch solid stock below they would get uniformly better results and a whiter light. There is no earthly reason for having a cored carbon below, the core being merely for the purpose of holding the current central in the carbon the better to enable the operator to control his crater. The lower carbon has no crater. There is a distinct objection to using cored carbons below since it adds to the deposit of the fine, white ash which is the residue of the waterglass in the core and operates to clog the lamp house ventholes and you get no added efficiency to offset this evil.

NEW SHOW IN TOWN.

The Penn Theater, under the management of The Penn Amusement Company, located at 409 Eighth avenue, New York City, opened its doors to the public on Friday evening, February 11, for the first time. We were among the first to witness the initial entertainment. After a few minutes of its opening the theater began to get crowded, which tends to show that a picture house was greatly needed in this section of the Empire City. Every one who entered greeted and wished the manager, who was standing at the door, success.

The lobby, which is painted white, is well lighted by a large number of electric lights, which give it a very pleasing and inviting aspect. No man needs to be ashamed of being seen coming out of this theater with his wife and children. The interior of the house is also very charming and the artistic embossed tin designs on the walls and ceiling are very pleasing to the eye. The theater is kept lighted by green painted electric globes during the performance. The seating capacity is around 250.

Three reels of first and second run licensed pictures and three vaudeville sketches constitute the entertainment for which a price of 10 cents is charged. We drew to the attention of the manager that the moving picture public do not want to see vaudeville in picture theaters, and he remarked that it was just a "try-out" to see how it would pull with the public of his neighborhood. He will, no doubt, cut it down to one act, and substitute in place more pictures and song slides.

Owing to the rapidly increasing business at the downtown branch, the Novelty Slide Company have found it necessary to secure larger quarters, and have removed from Room 25 to Room 13 in the same building, 10 East Fourteenth street. This office is now under the management of R. G. Skillman, a thoroughly competent and practical man, and exhibitors will find a large stock of song slides on hand at all times to select from. A full line of all Novelty products is also carried in stock, and full particulars, prices, etc., will be furnished all interested exhibitors upon inquiry.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"An Equine Hero" (Edison).—A picture detailing the marvelous intelligence of a horse. He does a number of things which are apparently guided by reason in their performance. In some ways it is one of the most remarkable films seen in a long time. No matter how it is considered, the mere fact that a horse can be trained, or directed, to do things which seem to require the exercise of reasoning powers, is sufficient to make the picture notable. But beyond that the film is an excellent picture, possessing all the qualities of a good photograph.

"A Queen of the Burlesque" (Edison).—A picture based upon a development of extravagant humor which can scarcely be described in print. But perhaps it is sufficient to say that some mischief-loving children, bent upon vengeance, succeed in making a spinster very ridiculous in the eyes of an elder of the church and he breaks off an engagement. It is all extravagantly funny and causes more than one laugh, even though there is a species of broad suggestion which may be resented by some, or, at least, deplored. It works out to the entire satisfaction of the children and the amusement of the onlookers. Better look at the picture and make your own decision.

"One Night and Then" (Biograph).—Whether this film is dramatically as powerful as it might be if it were changed a bit depends upon the point of view. There is a novelty, perhaps, in a wealthy man's arraying himself in a workman's clothes, throwing away his keys and locking his own door behind him. His subsequent attempt to enter his own house while seeking relief for an unfortunate and his fatal wounding are undoubtedly dramatically correct; but one must say in reference to the close that the dramatic power of the picture would not have suffered and a pleasanter impression would have been left if the man had been permitted to live after he had learned that "the greatest of these is charity." When there is some hope of a hitherto misspent life being utilized for the benefit of others it doesn't seem quite right to see it ended. Possibly such occurrences are common in real life, but in a drama there is surely no harm in correcting what to a large number of people seem errors of fate or some other malign influence. A pleasanter ending would, one may feel certain, be duly appreciated by the average audience. But in spite of this the film received applause which the action well merited.

"Loving Hearts" (Lubin).—A pretty story, well acted, which represents a love letter discarded by the author of a

"The Roman" (Selig).—Perhaps the most attractive feature of this picture is the reproduction of early Roman costumes and Roman surroundings. It is a story of political intrigue, with all the contests and disagreeable features connected therewith in the ancient city. But the reproduction of manners and customs and the historically correct scenery and settings add immensely to the interest and insure attention when perhaps the mere political story would scarcely be considered. The greatest service the motion picture can do is in the direction of educating the people, and a film like this, which faithfully illustrates long past and perhaps partially forgotten life, is of vast importance and deserves a cordial reception. The Selig players have brought enthusiasm to their work and have put much ability and life into the interpretation of this play.

"The Troubadour" (Pathe).—The name immediately brings up visions so romantic that one anticipates much that is interesting in this film; nor is he disappointed. There is much to interest, some, even, to please, and the dramatic qualities cannot be denied. Pictorially the film is quite up to the Pathe standard and promises to be very popular with theatergoers.

"Before and After" (Pathe).—A bit of comedy based upon the general acceptation of that term which raises many laughs before it is finished. There is plenty of life and action and the humor runs high.

"The Feud" (Kalem).—A melodrama having for its basis a feud over a boundary. There are a couple of lovers to make it interesting and a quarrel over a boundary to create the spice. It is all so full of action, and represents so well what almost anyone would be likely to do under similar circumstances that it arouses great interest. There is a gun fight at the boundary and another at the house, but the second one fails because of the difficulty in working the pistols. Then there is a reconciliation and everybody is happy once again. The action of the piece, and the accompanying interesting features, together with the happy ending, makes a pleasant picture. The dramatic features are well developed and there is a quality to the whole picture well worth seeing. The Kalem films have so much action and so much life that they are certain to attract.

story uniting eight hearts before the discovery is made that it is merely a bit of fiction. It is a lively, romantic little farce, certain to please and certain to make those who see it want more like it.

"The Hand of the Heiress" (Lubin).—A dainty bit of acting, depicting a wealthy American girl with sufficient independence to refuse the foreign title her parents purposed buying for her. And when she goes out for herself she soon learns that there is more in love than merely dollars or titles. The story is sympathetically acted and the staging is against backgrounds of more than an ordinary standard of beauty.

"Bitter Sweet" (Essanay).—A graphic representation of a near domestic tragedy, depicting a husband and wife quarreling, then deciding to separate and dividing the household belongings. This works admirably until they reach the trunk containing the clothes and playthings of the dead baby. Over that they forget their difficulties and come together again. There is some humor, but more pathos, and that of a sort which brings a suspicious moisture into the eyes of most of the audience. It is admirably acted and the photography is satisfactory.

"Druid Remains in Brittany" (Pathe).—This picture is sufficiently explained by its title, and one may obtain a clearer impression of the Druids by seeing the remains of their work as depicted in this beautifully colored picture. Their peculiar religious customs and their practices have combined to create an unfavorable impression in the modern mind; but they did some things worthy of commendation, and the remains here illustrated furnish abundant testimony upon this particular point. It is both a scenic and educational picture, the picturesque scenery of Brittany supplying an attractive background for the picture.

"The Foot Juggler" (Pathe).—An attractive picture of the character put out by this house, sufficiently described, perhaps, in its title. This type of picture is always to be commended, inasmuch as it affords so many who would otherwise never see anything of the kind an excellent representation of what is possible in this way. The pictures always prove popular with audiences. The work of this character by the Pathes is so well done that it often seems as though the real actor was present.

"Western Chivalry" (Essanay).—A lively and well-told story of how a girl proved to a bunch of cowboys that she was quite entitled to be admitted into their fraternity, winning their good-will by mounting and riding the worst horse on the ranch. Then, promising to be a good fellow, she is enthusiastically received into that mysterious, but none the less influential fraternity. The actors employed by this company seem to catch the true spirit of the cowboy and succeed in reproducing it in such a way that it appeals to all in a convincing manner.

"The Life of Moses, IV." (Vitagraph).—In this fourth great picture in a great series the "Victory of Israel" is graphically portrayed, and the story, as told in the Bible, acquires a new interest and the comprehension of those who see the picture is unquestionably greatly improved. The series has been remarkable in its fidelity to the original narrative. Each film has illustrated an important portion of the Bible story, and the fourth is no exception to the rule which has governed in the production of the former pictures. The same sumptuous staging and scheme of production is maintained, while the fidelity of interpretation seems even more notably developed than previously. As has been previously said regarding this series, the care exercised in producing is plainly evident, and the research which must have been required to secure the information necessary to reproduce the ancient scenes and have them approximate the best modern knowledge of Egypt and Israel, is well worthy the consideration of scholars and others interested in accurate work of this type. The fifth and last reel will be released February 19, thus making the entire series available for Lenten services. The five pictures would make one of the most striking and beneficial series ever issued if used for religious purposes in one program.

"The Bag Race" (Gaumont).—A humorous picture which affords as much sport as the original of any such thing always does. It is well photographed and supplies sufficient amusement while it is running.

"The Gambler's Doom" (Gaumont).—If one likes this class of subject no complaint need be uttered regarding this picture, but personally the writer does not care for it particularly, at the same time admitting its dramatic power and its appeal to those who look upon it merely as an episode to be forgotten as soon as seen. It may perform some service in deterring men from the practice of what is so often to their disadvantage and the lasting injury of those dependent upon them. While differences of opinion will always exist regarding such pictures, the main fact regarding the motion picture, that it is primarily for instruction or amusement, seems to have been overlooked in its production.

"Before and After" (Pathe).—The young man perhaps did well to cultivate his future mother-in-law before marriage. But the afterward. Well, it is not quite what was expected, but it is sufficient to bring more than one smile to the faces of those who see it. Like all before and after, it has its humorous side and leads to amusing complications, and therein lies its sport.

"The Jockey" (Pathe).—A pretty racetrack love story, which has for its basis the doctoring of a horse to prevent his winning a race. The girl in the case, however, overhears the agreement and changes the horses, so the wrong one is doctored and the favorite wins after all. But she marries the jockey just the same and the story ends happily. The real racing quality pervades the picture, which on that account is attractive to a large number of people. The action, too, is lively enough to satisfy the most exacting individual.

"The President's Special" (Edison).—A railroad picture which is so thrilling and seems so real that the audience is almost ready to stand in its seats and cheer. The subject is somewhat hackneyed, the overcoming by fatigue of an operator and his failure to flag an express as ordered, with all the impending danger of disaster and wreck averted through the pluck of his wife and an automobile's race with a locomotive as thrilling as it is novel. In fact, the interest centers in this part of the picture. It is doubtful if a more thrilling race was ever witnessed. And when the automobile wins and the train is stopped the audience applauds vigorously. The little woman has become a heroine of a remarkable motion picture. Not alone is the action spirited and sympathetic, but the photography is clear despite the rapid movement in some of the scenes. The scenic qualities have not been overlooked and many of the views are made additionally attractive by their picturesque features.

"The Wayside Shrine" (Vitagraph).—A pathetic story sympathetically acted, representing the experience of a young girl who falls in love with an artist, goes with him to the city, is deserted and finds her way back to the wayside shrine where she and her father formerly performed their devotions together. There is pathos and dramatic opportunity, cleverly developed and made leading features of an interesting picture. The acting is in harmony with the subject and the photographer has done his share of the work quite as well. It is altogether an attractive picture, well worth the serious consideration of any admirer of the motion picture drama in its best form.

"Pastoral Scenes" (Gaumont).—A mystical picture which will appeal strongly to those who like something that keeps them guessing as to what the next transformation will be. This house has always been particularly happy in the conception and development of mystical subjects and this is no exception to the rule. Not all pictures of this class are successful, but the average maintained by the Gaumonts has been high and this one will not detract from the reputation already established.

"The Acrobatic Fly" (Urban).—An entertaining picture, depicting very graphically the movements of a fly when viewed through a microscope and the enlarged image thrown upon the screen in a motion picture. The marvel of this picture is its clear photography, even though it reproduces a small object the motions of which are very rapid. And the success of the picture suggests unlimited educational possibilities. With the power of the microscope utilized in the production of motion pictures, there is opened to the mass of people a new world even more wonderful than the one with which they are familiar, because it is peopled with living creatures so small that the human eye is incapable of acquiring a clear understanding of them. This picture deserves a cordial welcome wherever it is shown, and if the audience before which it was exhibited upon the day of its release can be taken as an indication, there is no question about the interest pictures of this character will excite.

"Aviation at Los Angeles, Cal." (Essanay).—Much improvement is noted in the pictures of flying as operators have acquired experience in the manipulation of their apparatus. The work of this firm during the recent meet in Los Angeles is satisfactory. It gives both near and distant views of the aviators and their machines before the start, as they start, and during flight. Next to seeing the machines in operation this picture is probably as good as anything could be produced and affords an admirable substitute for the actual occurrence. The photography of this film is remarkably clear, and when the character of the subject is considered one concludes that it would be difficult indeed to improve upon it. The showing of this picture through the country will convey to many thousands a reasonably accurate impression of what an aviation meet is like.

"Baby's First Tooth" (Essanay).—Always there is consternation, or something else disturbing in a household when the baby's first tooth protrudes itself upon the scene. And in the instance here illustrated the interruption of the telephone service at the critical time added to the difficulties by creating the impression upon Mr. Lighthead that some terrible calamity had befallen his family. His feelings may be imagined when he arrives at home, dishevelled and torn, by reason of numerous moving incidents by flood and field, only to learn that "baby has a tooth." The veil of charity may be drawn over the scene that followed.

"The Fisherman's Granddaughter" (Kalem).—Another of this firm's melodramatic pictures, acted by the stock company at their new studio at Roseland, Fla. The beautiful scenery along the St. John's River is featured, and the strongly dramatic quality of the picture will commend it to all who admire the Kalem productions. There is a romantic air about pictures which reproduce the scenery of the South that appeals strongly to nearly all audiences, and this instance is no exception to the rule. Clearly photographed and admirably acted, this picture promises to be quite as popular as its predecessors have been.

"Never Despair" (Great Northern).—A graphic picture, representing the transition from misery to happiness and bearing upon its face the admonition to never despair whatever adversity may confront you. It is a dramatic subject, admirably staged, satisfactorily acted and clearly photographed. It will be an attractive feature of any program.

Scene from "Never Despair" (Great Northern).

"Foolshead Receives" (Itala).—Foolshead is a character that would not fail to amuse an audience regardless of how lugubrious they might be. When with another house the actor who performs the principal part was a comedian of merit, and his work with this firm has been satisfactory. In this particular instance he advances some novel and altogether funny ideas upon receiving, to the amusement anyway and possibly the edification of the audience.

"The Man Who Could Not Sit Down" (Lux).—Unfortunate, indeed, is the man who cannot sit down, and to be driven from place to place is discouraging enough. Therefore, no one is surprised to see this gentleman finally throw himself upon his own floor, utterly tired out and ready to lie down in order to rest. The photography is clear in most scenes and the action is sufficiently lively to maintain interest.

"Her Dolly's Revenge" (Lux).—A nursery story which represents a doll taking a pair of scissors and stabbing her mistress to death. Then the doll is sentenced to execution. Here the little girl wakes to discover that she and the doll are both well, showing no apparent inconvenience from such unexpected and murderous schemes. This picture will please the little people and at the same time will attract the attention of the elders.

"The Silent Piano" (Ambrosio).—A romantic story telling plainly how love conquers duty, well acted and photographed with care and discretion. The films made by this house, and released by the New York Motion Picture Company, are improving each week and present qualities which are increasing their popularity daily. Some of the scenes in this film are very dramatic and the climaxes are worked out with skill and understanding.

"I Have Lost My Latch Key" (Ambrosio).—A roaring farce, depicting clearly the difficulties encountered by an unfortunate individual who loses that all-important instrument, a latch key. The players have put a good deal of effort into acting this farce and the results are satisfactory.

"The Old Maid and Bonehead" (Nestor).—The creation of a series of characters which may be seen through a series of films is always a feature of importance to a firm's business, and when this house hit upon the character of Bonehead for a series of screaming farces it offered something which sprang into almost instant popularity. This one is a farce which will keep an audience roaring from beginning to end and will no doubt make those who see it want more of the same sort.

Scene from "Young Deer's Gratitude" (Bison).

"Young Deer's Gratitude" (Bison).—A sequel to "Young Deer's Bravery" and enacted by the same character whose face has been familiar in Indian pictures for some time. There are some stirring scenes and good photography which should make the film popular.

"Foolshead Preaches Temperance" (Itala).—Judging from pictures which have gone before, temperance would be a good thing for Foolshead to practice, but perhaps preaching is easier than practicing. At any rate, that is the impression graphically presented by this film, and his sermonizing, with its accompaniments of one sort and another, is funny indeed.

"Government Rations" (New York Motion Picture Company).—Illustrative of the difficulties at an Indian post when three Mexicans steal a quantity of rations and the Indians are accused of the theft, resulting in a raid and more or less fighting and disturbance. When the mistake is discovered by the finding of the Mexicans devouring the rations, the colonel calls a truce, apologizes to the Indians in a very gentlemanly manner indeed, they all smoke and peace reigns once more over the scene. Here is sufficient dime novel action and heroism for anyone, but there are certain attractive features which appeal strongly to the audience and cause a glow of satisfaction in most instances.

"Justice in the Far North" (Imp).—When the impression left on one's mind after seeing a film is "What it might have been" it is safe to say that the producer has failed to hit the mark. The story of this Imp film is not particularly favorable, as a matter of fact, it leans too much to the loose morals that we so often have occasion to condemn in European films. And the producer has not saved it from further blame, as in many places it is inconsistent. The acting is good, however, and the action lively enough to please any audience.

"Jane and the Stranger" (Imp).—A story of an unfaithful father who deserts the girl he has wronged and migrates to the West, where he is discovered by the girl's brother. The wrong is revenged in a highly dramatic manner, which introduces Jane, the pet of the Western ranchmen. She innocently causes the arrest of the brother who took the law in his own hands, but saves his life in a truly dramatic manner when she learns through a letter that his crime was justifiable. A fine bit of acting and by-play follows when she lets the ranchmen into the secret and they plan a pleasant surprise for the man who expected to get it in the neck. There is a strength and go to this picture throughout its entire length which will gladden the exhibitor.

"Ruined by His Son" (Great Northern).—A story with a strong moral and well presented with the careful and elaborate setting for which the Great Northern films are famous. The films of this company are of a class peculiar to themselves. A serious tone runs through them all. If the film is a scenic it is well done, if it is a drama we have become accustomed to look for the moral or sermon, and the present film is no exception, except that the fine technique of this firm's product seems to be getting finer.

"A Daughter's Devotion" (Nestor).—This firm's work is comparatively new in the motion picture field, but if it is all as good as what has been shown it will speedily reach a high degree of popularity. This picture is one of those tender little dramas which depict clearly and sympathetically the devotion of a daughter under trying circumstances. The acting is well done, and the dramatic possibilities of the picture are handled with skill and discretion. The mechanical part is in harmony with the dramatic portion and the entire picture is a pleasing combination. It will go far toward making this firm's work popular.

J. H. HALLBERG

About eighteen months ago, an exhibitor, Mr. Chas. Guilloid of Hoboken, N. J., put in a cheap Economy Coil to save current on his moving picture lamp. After a week's operation, he found his coil got so hot that it was not safe to run his show continously. As he had already bought one of these cheap Economy Coils, he could not get his money out of it, so he had to buy another one, and by means of a double throw switch he ran first on one coil, and when that got hot, switched on the other one, and so on. A few weeks ago, one of these coils burned out, and then he did the wise thing He came to me and bought a

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

A World reporter last week, in his desire to make copy and at the same time say something nice about the Vitagraph Company, got himself in trouble by saying that the Vitagraph third reel would be educational. This brought a storm of protest from those exchanges who do not favor educational subjects. What the reporter intended to convey was that the additional Vitagraph reel would be educational in quality, as he was alive to the great preparations under way to stage "Elektra" and other classical subjects. And this is so. As a matter of fact, there is no American producer better equipped to-day to issue three reels per week and still maintain or improve the quality.

One of the Vitagraph's accommodating neighbors, and there are many of these, loaned his house for the scene of the doctor's home in the drama, "On the Border Line." A sign: "Dr. Bell," was placed in one of the front windows to carry out the doctor idea. After the picture was taken, the sign was forgotten and left in the window. About 2 o'clock the next morning the occupant of the house was aroused by the vigorous and prolonged ringing of the door bell. He stuck his head out of an upper window and asked the disturber of his slumbers what the trouble was.

"Trouble! It's double trouble, doctor. Twins!" said the caller. "And we want you to come around to the house as quick as you can." The accommodating neighbor said: "I'm not a doctor."

"What's that sign doing in your window then?" was the reply.

"Cuss, ———! ———!" said the tenant. "That was left there by the moving picture people." The window went down with a bang and the sign was removed.

Through a coincidence the Edison and Vitagraph Companies announce for release on March 4, "At the Eleventh Hour," two entirely different stories. Out of courtesy to the Edison Company, the Vitagraph Company's release for March 4 has been changed to "On the Border Line."

The presentation of facts is always convincing. "The Victims of Fate," which the Vitagraph Company will release in the near future, is founded upon a fact, an actual occurrence in North Carolina, and reported in the press throughout the world. It is a drama of the strongest and most convincing character, pulsating with truths stronger than fiction, teaching a moral which will be a lasting impression on the minds of all who see it. It proves that the just often suffer with the unjust and vengeance belongs to a higher power than man.

The great interest which has been aroused by Strauss' "Elektra" has prompted the Vitagraph Company to prepare in moving pictures a different version of this thrilling tragedy, a creation unequalled in elegance of scenic and histrionic art, calling into play the authorized details as suggested by Homer's "Iliad" and other works of Grecian literature and record. This will give to the public within a few weeks a clear, concise and comprehensive performance of the universally talked of "Elektra."

EDISON NOTES.

The Edison Company announces for release in the near future, as the second of their series of films depicting the stories of famous grand operas, "Carmen," with Mlle. Pilar-Morin as the central figure. In the character of the pleasure loving cigarette girl of Seville, Mlle. Morin will be afforded an opportunity to display her mimetic talent. In the interpretation of this story she will have the assistance of a specially selected cast of characters who may be depended upon to give her the best of support. A sumptuous production of the opera is promised, with costumes and scenery on a scale of magnificence unsurpassed in the history of motion pictures

Roy Norton, whose connection with the Edison Company has been referred to several times in these columns, has contributed one of his most delightful characters to their production, "Easy Miller," who will be quickly recognized by the thousands of readers of Mr. Norton's stories when he makes his appearance in the character of the bashful young prospector in "His First Valentine" on March 11. The title of the film suggests a comedy, but such is not the case, although there is a happy blending of that element in the story, which is intensely dramatic in several of its principal scenes.

"Ranson's Folly," by Richard Harding Davis, is slated for release on March 1. Perhaps no development in film production during the past year has excited more interest than did the announcement that America's foremost novelist had allied himself with the Edison Company and would put into pictorial form his world renowned stories. Of all his works "Ranson's Folly" is one of the best known.

THE POWERS COMPANY RELEASES.

After a period of reorganization and with increased facilities, The Powers Company will resume their regular releases next month. Tuesday, March 8, "Her Cowboy Lover" will be issued, and is said to be a topnotcher. The independent exchanges all regretted the temporary suspension of Columbia films and the announcement that a regular weekly release is coming should be good news. If the demand for Columbia films is encouraging, The Powers Company are prepared now to issue two reels a week.

$2,500,000 COMPANY INCORPORATED.

Articles of incorporation of the General Film Company, which is to manufacture and deal in moving picture apparatus, were filed in the office of the Hudson County Clerk in Jersey City, on February 9. The capital stock is $2,500,000, of which $1,000,000 is cumulative preferred. The incorporators are: Harry M. Gough, of Glen Ridge, N. J.; Guernsey R. Jewett, of Brooklyn; Willoughby J. Kingsbury, of 3458 Broadway, Manhattan; Emil O. Mann, of 269 West 131st street, Manhattan; William G. Hovey, of Woodmere, L. I., and Harry J. Mullineaux, of Bethlehem, Pa. The main office of the company is given as 15 Exchange place, Jersey City.

PANTOGRAPH RELEASES FRIDAY.

At the last meeting of the executive committee of the N. I. M. P. A. the matter of releasing was brought up; it was found that four releases were being made on Saturday and but one on Friday. In order to balance the releases and at the request of the majority of exchanges, it was decided that the Pantograph Corporation change its release day to Friday, therefore on and after Friday, February 18, the release day of Pantograph films will be on Friday.

The many friends of Red Wing, the only full-blooded Indian actress posing for motion pictures, will no doubt be pleased to hear that she has fully recovered from the accident with which she met a few weeks ago. Red Wing was injured by falling off her horse while taking part in the production of a new moving picture subject. Red Wing and her husband, Young Deer, who are members of the Bison Stock Company, now in the Southwest producing new subjects for the New York Motion Picture Company, come from the Winnebago tribe of Indians, and are considered to be the foremost Indian actors of the day.

NESTOR FILMS.

The third adventure of Bonehead proved to be so strenuous for the chief character that this week's release will be the last of the Bonehead comedies for some time to come. A new series is in preparation and as soon as poor Bonehead recovers his nerve and his bruises heal he will again try his luck in his search for an heiress.

Plans for a new studio, to be located in Bavonne, N. J., were approved this week and work will be rushed on it as fast as possible to enable the production of two reels a week, which is impossible in the present quarters.

"The Mountaineer," recently released, has created so much favorable comment from Independent exhibitors that more pictures of this class may be expected in the near future and every effort will be put forth to maintain the photographic quality which was a feature of this picture. A return to cowboy subjects is made in this week's release in the subject "In Arizona," and it is also beautiful in photography and action, fully maintaining the high standard of this company's Western dramas.

FROM PASTIME THEATER, BRUNSWICK, GA.

Mr. H. M. King, Jr., proprietor of the Pastime Theater, writes on January 7, 1910, that during October, 1909, he put in a "Hallberg" Economizer for his moving picture lamp, and that he is more than pleased with the investment. He says that the bill for electric current consumed during September, the month before he installed the "Hallberg," was $49.83. His bill for December was only $16.39, and the November bill was less. A saving of $33.44 per month is almost one-half of the cost of the "Hallberg" and is surely a profitable investment.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WHY NOT GIVE CREDIT WHERE CREDIT IS DUE?

Chicago, Ill., Dec. 7, 1909.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—The author of a story receives the credit of having written it, and likewise the playwright who dramatizes the story receives the credit for having dramatized it; why should not the writer of a moving picture play receive credit for his work also? These plays, as the writer understands it, are largely the work of struggling young authors, written and submitted to the various companies, and the writing of them is fast becoming a specialty. Why, then, not give to the men whose brains originate these ideas the credit for their work?

Occasionally some one of the companies produces the work of some well-known author who has gained a reputation outside of moving picture lines, and in such cases I notice that the name of the writer always appears on the screen. It would seem that where the writer has already attained to popularity or note the companies are anxious to profit by it, but where they are obscure they desire to prevent them from ever becoming otherwise. This is obviously unfair and is not a square deal to the unknown writers who are to-day writing most of the moving picture plays. True, the producer no doubt trims and adapts the play to suit his taste and convenience, but so does the stage manager trim and adapt a drama, and yet the dramatist receives his part of the credit! Why not give credit where credit is due? Why not give the public the author's name on the screen?

A SUBSCRIBER.

[We think there is great force in "A Subscriber's" suggestion. As our readers are already aware, some of the moving picture manufacturing companies announce the authors of their stories on the screen, in their bulletins, and in their advertisements. But, in our opinion, just as good stories by unknown men are made into moving pictures, and we agree with our correspondent that they should have credit for their work. All the same, he and we perceive that this is a very difficult thing to do. The well-known novelists and story writers who have come into the moving picture field have made their reputations with the general public, and that is presumably why they are engaged to supply the stories. The unknown scenario writers who are anxious to obtain publicity can do so, we imagine, by the fact of the film makers constantly requiring their work. Then, we assume, the authors could bargain for the publication of their names. We, ourselves, are curious to know who the authors of certain stories were that we have admired during the past year. We shall refer to this subject in an article next week.—Eds. M. P. W.]

MUSIC FOR MOVING PICTURE HOUSES.

Lafayette, Ind., February 8, 1910.

Mr. J. M. B., care Moving Picture World.

Dear Sir—Kindly permit me to thank you for the very able articles you have contributed in the Moving Picture World relative to the use of appropriate music for motion picture theaters. I really believe that the stand you have taken relative to "music to fit the pictures" will have a very good and wholesome effect upon moving picture theater managers, and that a good many will awaken to the fact that appropriate music greatly enhances the value of motion picture entertainment. Being a practical musician of twenty years' experience, I observed some time ago the necessity of appropriate music. Acting upon this observation, I compiled and published a book of music which I think fills this "long felt want." This book is called "Motion Picture Piano Music," and it contains music of all sorts to fit the action, character, scenes, etc., of moving pictures. The articles which you have recently written in the Moving Picture World are a great source of enlightenment to moving picture theater managers, and if they will follow your business "tips" they will not have to resort to vaudeville and other expensive and useless methods. If the moving picture theater managers would insist that their pianist try and conform their music to the picture, it would soon be noticed that the patronage of the theater would greatly increase in numbers, superinduced by the added enjoyment and pleasure derived by having the picture properly interpreted. Assuring you of my hearty appreciation for your efforts on behalf of appropriate music for motion picture theaters, I am,

Very truly yours,
GREGG A. FRELINGER.

RHEOSTAT PROBLEMS.

Wadesboro, N. C., Feburary 2, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I read the article in your February 5 issue, headed "Richardson Criticized," in regard to the rheostat question, and thought I would like to write a few lines in regard to the subject myself.

I agree with H. M. C. that Mr. Richardson made a couple mis-statements but I do not think H. M. C. made the subject quite clear yet. The statement made by the latter to which I take exception to this: "If the line voltage is 110, then, regardless of the volume of current which is required to give the desired illumination, this resistance must be sufficient to cut down the voltage from 110 to approximately 45." Now, supposing if two exhibitors, both using direct current at 110 volts, one only requires 15 amperes to give this desired illumination and the other requires 30 amperes, must both use a rheostat of the same resistance, namely, enough to cut the voltage down from 110 to 45? How then does one regulate his arc to 15 amperes and the other to 30 amperes?

This question is solved easily enough by just following the Ohm's law: $E = C\,R$, that is, the pressure, E, or 110 volts, is equal to the current flowing, in amperes, multiplied by the resistance in ohms. Likewise, to find the resistance required in a rheostat for any adjustment of current in the arc, we follow this Ohm's law: $C = \frac{E}{R}$ or $R = \frac{E}{C}$; for example, we want to use 20 amperes in the arc, then the resistance required through the rheostat and arc is $R = \frac{E}{C}$, or $R = 100$ divided by $20 = 5\frac{1}{2}$ ohms. If you want only 10 amperes the resistance will be $\frac{110}{10} = 11$ ohms. Bear in mind that this is the resistance of the whole circuit, including the rheostat and arc, and not rheostat alone.

From the foregoing we make these deductions: To vary the current or illuminations you must vary the resistance of the rheostat, which varies the voltage across the arc when the latter is in use. Now we come to the method by which you can vary the current through the arc. Suppose your rheostat is set so that a voltmeter reading, taken across the lamp terminals when it is in use, shows 50 volts and an ammeter in series with the arc shows a current of 25 amperes flowing, then the resistance of the arc must be $(R = \frac{E}{C})$ 50 divided by 25 or 2 ohms. Now suppose you wanted to increase the current to 50 amperes; you will, of course, have to cut out some of the resistance until the ammeter shows 50 amperes. The resistance of the arc remains about the same, so the voltage across the arc will then be nearly 100 volts, because it takes that voltage to force a current of 50 amperes through a resistance of 2 ohms. (Ohm's law again, $E = C\,R$.)

In regard to the 220-volt proposition, the foreging shows that the voltage across the arc must be about the same, to get the same illumination, no matter what the supply voltage may be. This explanation may also help to make it clear why the economizers on the market for direct current and those for alternating current made on the transformer principle will produce a much steadier arc than a rheostat. These do reduce the voltage to a certain amount so that when the arc gets long the voltage will not go over this amount and make the arc blue and flame, but by keeping the carbons close together the light will be steady and pure white.

Yours truly,
PAUL PATRICK,
Lyric Theater, Wadesboro, N. C.

RELIGIOUS PRODUCTIONS.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—I do not claim to know how to make motion pictures, but I claim to have enough experience to judge a good production.

To the public in general, "Moses," Part No. 4, is not the proper picture to impress a Sunday School class, but is altogether too theatrical. There is nothing impressive in the picture, nothing sublime, even the numerous painted backgrounds lack the effect of perspective so desired in such productions and give it too much the stamp of the staged show.

I admit that the passage of the Red Sea would have required the skill of the most experienced stage managers and would have called for many tricks and illusions to give it the proper grandeur, and if I had been unable to produce a realistic scene I would have omitted the passage of the Red Sea, instead of contenting myself to show a little stream of which the waters are not parted but vanish away.

It seems to me that some of our manufacturers are abusing the fad of showing facial expressions. It is all right to show facial expression in certain scenes of certain productions, when the actors are natural or when they have spent much time and care to provide a makeup as deceiving as possible; but to show us facial expression with a cheap makeup, with beards of cotton and even showing the strings holding the wigs and beards, it is pushing the facial expressions a little too far.

To obtain face expressions, the camera is so close that the participants have to be crowded in a very small space and in some cases they look like a box of sardines.

The same drawback of having the camera so close to the stage robs the audience of the spectacular effects, which should be so prominent in this class of work. When you can see the feet of the people you can scarcely see the heads, and when the heads are shown the lower part of the bodies are not in sight. The whole thing is too crowded on a too small stage. In the "Moses" picture, when the Egyptian chariots appear, you can see only one at a time and you cannot even see it in full, and when the horses are on the screen you see only part of the chariot. For such scenes the stage should be large and deep, to give room for a number of chariots to pass at the same time.

These remarks are not intended to be unfriendly, but merely an opinion of how such productions should be presented to the public. AN EXHIBITOR.

[We disagree with our correspondent, although we appreciate his point. Probably he sat too near the picture and, therefore, saw too much. We are dealing with this subject in an early issue of the "World."—Eds. M. P. W.]

LOCAL COMPETITION.

Albia, Iowa, Feb. 15, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I have noted with considerable interest the discussion which seems to have arisen after the letter in your issue of January 29, from J. E. B., of our city. The point in controversy: "Is a town of 4,500 capable of supporting two picture shows?"

Since I am the new competitor in the city which gave rise to your recent series of communications on this point, I have naturally been much interested, and I feel that a brief description of the actual local conditions might be of interest to some.

Albia is the county seat of the largest coal-producing county in Iowa; it has connected with it two large coal mining towns whose population are nearly equal to Albia; transportation is effected by regular trolley interurban service, and all trading of importance is done in our city. The amount of payroll moneys put into circulation here is equal to many cities in this State having a population of eight to ten thousand.

We came to Albia with the kindliest feeling toward competitors and were induced to make the venture by the local industrial conditions and the brilliant future prospect that Albia has. The picture show price here has always been ten cents. Hence we caused to be built a modern fireproof theater, 40 x 90 feet, concrete floor and walls, with 14 feet ceiling elevation at entrance and 18 feet at the orchestra pit; seating capacity of about 500. The decorative scheme, we are told, is as elaborately elegant and tasty as any house in the country of equal size. The building alone cost about $6,000.

We exchange courtesies with the regular opera house, but when we went to our other competitor with a view of arranging a harmonious set of working conditions, were informed that the town was not large enough for both of us and that as far as they were concerned the business would be conducted along that line of feeling.

Well, we have carried on a vigorous and businesslike campaign of advertising and conscientiously feel that we have the respect of the merchants and business men. Personally, I am an admirer of your Mr. Richardson and feel that he hit the nail in the face when he stated something to the effect that a show town must be judged by its environment. We feel that Albia is large enough to support two very good picture houses. If it is not, someone will have to "take the count." We broke all of our previous records last week. This is Tuesday, and we broke our Monday record yesterday.

Respectfully yours,
C. C. STRUBLE.

WE PAUSE FOR A REPLY.

Albia, Ia., February 8, 1910.

The Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I have read very carefully your comments on my letter, published in your issue of January 29, and also your article in issue for February 12, entitled "Exhibiting as a Fine Art." I desire to extend to you my heartiest congratulations for your change of attitude.

In reply to the questions you ask in the note appended to my letter, will say that it is conceded in my neighborhood and surrounding vicinity that I have the most up-to-date house and give the best pictures. The interior of my theater is artistically decorated and is kept lighted during the entertainment by green shaded lamps. These are shaded in such a manner as not to affect the picture on the screen. I also have a small stage.

I show two reels of pictures every day. These are from twenty to thirty days old. My piano player is first class and my singer has had world-wide experience.

I use a Motiograph machine and would not be without it.

It took me almost half a year to get my place in first class running order, and now comes another show giving vaudeville and issuing free meal tickets to some of my best patrons. They are trying to put me out of business, and there is no doubt about it. Now, do you call this clean competition? My show is so good that not a clergyman in town has said anything against it. Again, I will ask you, has the Patents Company done right in granting this new house a license?

Yours very truly,
J. E. B.

AN EXCELLENT SUGGESTION TO EXHIBITORS

is made by The Moving Picture World when it advises exhibitors to show as a specially fitting the brilliant series of Biblical pictures known as "The Life of Moses." Do NOT attempt to feature this great show without music and lecture and expert guidance. These three needful requisites are supplied by the well-known lecturer, who, if you wish, will take charge of this production for you. Rev. Madison C. Peters, under whose supervision the pictures were staged and produced, had Mr. Bush lecture on these reels in his church, the Greenhill Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia.

LENTEN ENTERTAINMENT

Dr. Peters writes:

"My Dear Mr. Bush: I wish to congratulate you on the successful way in which you have been talking to interested audiences on the Bible moving pictures. I believe that you have a new field for interesting churches and Sunday schools by the use of motion pictures, and your very successful way of speaking while the pictures are in motion. I wish you continued success in your work. With best wishes,

"Yours truly,
"MADISON C. PETERS."

Every one of the reels is superbly staged, strikingly correct in the matter of scenery and costumes, and intensely dramatic.

W. STEPHEN BUSH,
44 North Tenth St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Now that exhibitors and public know when to expect "Ranson's Folly," Richard Harding Davis' arrangement of his well-known novel for the picture drama, the interest in its appearance has only been increased. This film is expected to be the great big "hit" of the season, and will be if the Edison players have arisen to the possibilities of the piece and absorbed some of the strength with which Mr. Davis invested its characters in the original story. The Edison Company promises that this has been done by the cast of players who interpret the film. The part of Lieut. Ranson was entrusted to Wm. J. Sorelle, one of the most finished players in the Edison Stock Company. Mr. Sorelle is an actor of intelligence, quick perception and long experience, and in addition to these qualities has a fine stage presence. In the character of Lieut. Ranson he is said to be especially convincing. The other parts were entrusted to actors of the same calibre, so that "Ranson's Folly" will not suffer from a lack of talent in its silent dramatization. As has been announced in the Edison Kinetogram, "Ranson's Folly" will be released on March 1.

HIS LAST BURGLARY

HOW A BABY REGENERATES HIM.

The Biograph in this subject has produced, without doubt, the most unique and consistent story ever presented. A young inventor, while waiting a return on his invention, sees starvation staring the little family of himself, wife and baby in the face. In dire desperation they clandestinely leave the baby in the minister's home, that it at least may be spared their fate. Later the minister's house is entered by a burglar, who has just suffered the loss of his only child. The sight of the foundling induces him to take it home to his wife, who is mourning beside the empty cradle. Meanwhile the father has realized on his patent and goes to reclaim their baby, but, of course, the minister knows nothing of it. The shock almost drives the poor mother insane. The burglar, influenced by the baby's presence, determines to be a man, and engages as a coachman to the doctor who is attending the grief wrecked mother. Thus he learns the identity of the baby, and in his burglar attire enters the sick room and places the baby beside her while she sleeps.

TAMING A HUSBAND.—Lady Margaret loved her husband with youthful impetuosity and while he deeply loved her, still so engrossed was he with social and business matters that he was often guilty of seeming indifference. She believed that his love had grown cold, and in desperation confides her fears to her best friend, Lady Clarissa, inviting her to visit and advise her. Lady Clarissa arrives and at once hits upon a plan. She dresses herself in male attire, and assumes the role of a lover, sure that she will tame Margaret's husband and bring him to his sense of duty. Clarissa, as a young gallant, makes quite an impression upon the male companions of the husband and finds her position at times rather embarrassing, especially when invited to join their drinking and smoking fests. Hence she realizes she will put her scheme into operation at once. To this end she blatantly flirts with Lady Margaret. Several times they are apparently surprised together by the husband. But as it is during the entertainment of a house full of guests, he has small chance of resenting the insult. However, he finally catches the young unknown on his knees before his wife. This is too much and a challenge is the outcome. Seconds are selected and the time set. The seconds for the masquerading Clarissa try to dissuade their "man" from meeting his adversary, stating that the other man has such an advantage over him, he being such a big fellow. This has no effect, as Clarissa exclaims: "I will fight him, sir, though he were as tall as a tower." The seconds leave, despairing for their friend, as it seems suicidal. They return again with another plea and find their "man" in the arms of the wife. This enrages them, and having withnessed his perfidy, refuse to act, reasoning that the field of honor is too good; he should be slain on the spot. They convey to the husband their impression and the cause of it, which throws him into a frenzy of fury. Into the house they go with swords in hand, bent on instantly despatching the vile wretch. Lady Clarissa sees them coming and locks the door, which she realizes will prove but a slight obstruction to the raging husband, so she, frightened, dons her conventional habiliments, and when the door yields to their battering, in rushes the husband to learn the truth of the situation and appreciate the guilt of his own negligence.

HIS LAST BURGLARY.—William Standish, a young inventor, like many of his ilk, has spent time, money and energy in perfecting a machine which the engineers to whom he had submitted it are slow in deciding upon, during which time he and his little family of a wife and infant child are in poverty's clutches. Starvation stares them in the face. The baby gives them the most concern, and after a desperate mental struggle, they decide to leave it clandestinely in the minister's care. To this end they go to the minister's house at night, and being the dead of Winter, they have not the heart to leave it on the stoop, so Standish climbs through the window and leaves it in the sitting-room on an arm-chair. In the neighborhood there lives a professional burglar, whose wife we see bending over an empty cradle mourning the loss of her child. The burglar, despite his calling, is moved by his wife's sorrow, and leaves the house dejectedly on an expedition. The open window in the minister's home looks rather inviting; Standish in his hurried exit neglected to close it, so he enters and begins to explore the place. The cooing of the baby startles him, and after reading the note Standish had left, an idea strikes him. Why not take the baby? Truly, it is a new kind of loot, but it may mean happiness for his wife. This thought decides him, so he rushes to his home with the child. The bereft wife is raised to the very zenith of joy at its appearance, and the burglar himself becomes regenerated, declaring he is through with his past life and will now life worthy of the blessing God has bestowed. To this end he goes to seek honest employment. Meanwhile, there has been a change in the conditions of the parents of the baby. On their return home they find a letter accepting the invention upon a $5,000 yearly royalty, enclosing a check in payment of the first quarter. Thus has fortune smiled and they hurry back to reclaim the child. Of course, the minister doesn't know anything about it. The whole affair is plunged into absolute mystery, and the poor mother, when taken to the comfortable home their new fortune provides, is seriously ill from her mind wrecking grief. Now it happens that the burglar has become the coachman of the doctor who is attending her, and so learns the identity of the foundling. His heart touched by the suffering of the poor woman, he hastens home, dons his burglar attire, steals into the woman's room, and lays the baby beside her while she sleeps. This act not only restores the suffering woman, but it has softened his hitherto hard and indifferent heart, making for all time a real man of him.

LOST AND REGAINED.—A happy sailor is shown enjoying the pleasures of home life with his wife and child, when suddenly he is recalled to his ship. In the course of his path to the pier he passes over a drawbridge which is being repaired and from which a workman has removed a guard rail in order to pass through with a wheelbarrow. The sailor, seeing no obstacle in his way, walks into the opening and plunges headlong into the water, striking his head on the rocks.

The workman, hearing the splash, instantly jumps to his rescue and brings him ashore. The sailor is taken to a hospital and on his recovery, a few weeks later, it is discovered that the blow on his head has destroyed all memory of the past. Meanwhile his wife and child learn through the papers that the ship on which they believed the husband and father had sailed has been wrecked at sea, and that all on board were lost. When the sailor leaves the hospital he has no recollection of his loved ones, and wanders idly around from place to place. Passing along a street one day he sees a house on fire, and immediately goes to the rescue of its inmates. He saves from the flames a child, who proves to be his own. But this fact is denied him until a falling beam, striking him upon the head, removes the clot of blood from his brain and revives his memory of the past. It is not until he regains consciousness at the hospital, however, that the father recognizes and clasps his loved ones as his own.

THAT GIRL OF DIXON'S.—The little heroine is the daughter of Dixon, a foreman in one of the big cotton compresses, the mighty workings of which are shown in the picture. We see her, early in the picture, showing her fear and repulsion for the black bottle, which spells so much tragedy these days. A child in years, she takes a child's way of ridding herself of the object of her dislike by surreptitiously removing the bottle when her father seems to be taking too much of its contents. Then follows a scene in which the father recovers the bottle. In his drunken fury he forgets himself, and would abuse the child who is trying her very hardest to save him from himself.

Here the young hero of the story comes upon the scene. In passing Dixon's home he sees the small tragedy which is taking place at the gateway and interferes. He is successful in protecting the little girl, but arouses the sullen anger of the chronically inebriated father. When he reports the occurrence to his own father, Dixon is sent for and discharged. This, added to the incident of the morning, furnishes fuel to an intense drunken hatred in the man's breast. He works himself into a passion over the incident and decides to administer a thrashing to the youth, even though he is the son of his employer. He sends a note by a small colored boy, which, purporting to come from the girl, asks the young man to come to the compress and protect her again from the beating which she fears as a result of the day's happenings. The boy says nothing to his father, but goes at once to the cotton compress.

Men are leaving for the night, and the place is almost deserted. As the young fellow, looking for the girl, approaches the great machine, he is confronted by Dixon. An altercation ensues, in the course of which the youth is felled by a blow on the head from a piece of wood which Dixon picks up from the floor. The sight of the boy lying senseless at his feet increases his fury, and his befuddled brain conceives the awful idea of sending the boy into eternity by placing him on the compress, whose mighty jaws compress hundreds of pounds of cotton into a thin wedge, and starting the machine. This he does and runs away, and we see the great bed move upward with its human freight until it almost touches the upper platen. Fortunately, "That Girl of Dixon's" has seen the youth enter the compress house, and, her suspicions aroused because it is after quitting time, has followed him. She arrives just in the nick of time, too, when another two inches of pressure would have killed the boy. Dashing forward, she reverses the lever and the machine slowly returns to its first position.

The boy's father shows his gratitude by giving the girl a chance in life—a chance to get away from her present surroundings and build up a new future; and the last scene of the picture contains a brief suggestion of one way in which the future probably worked out.

THE WINNING OF FATHER.—Johnny Armstrong, a young college graduate, is in love with pretty Peggy Pettibone. Peggy also loves Johnny and the only obstacle in the way of a thoroughly happy union is Father, a crabbed old gentleman who has no faith in his daughter's choice.

Their attempts to meet and spoon are invariably frustrated by Pettibone, until both are thoroughly exasperated and plan to elope.

On the night, as had been previously planned, Johnny climbs up a rather shaky ladder to assist his lady fair to the ground, but when he enters her room some commotion is made and old Hiram Pettibone, dosing in his easy chair in the library, awakens. Surmising that the noise has come from Peggy's chambers, he calls the butler and the two hurry upstairs to locate the trouble. Peggy has heard them coming and has thrust young Armstrong into the closet. She is unable to conceal the fact that she has prepared for a long journey and when her father enters she is unable to find any excuse for being dressed for travelling.

A noise from the closet attracts the old gentleman. "Aha, so the impudent young rascal is in there, hey?" the old man exclaims triumphantly; and to the butler: "James, call the police."

It might be well to mention that the elder Pettibone is a most diminutive man and no match for the athletic Johnny, who is endeavoring to push his way out of the closet, while the little old fellow makes heroic resistance. But Johnny gets out and after some argument with his reluctant prospective father-in-law, thrusts him bodily into the closet.

The police arrive and Armstrong indicates the clothes-closet door. Pettibone is dragged out and carried down into the library, but the young man interferes here an tells the police to release their prisoner.

The old man, puffing and snorting, is finally calmed and seated in his easy chair, shaking his head, thoroughly defeated. And it is with very little further coaxing that he is persuaded to give his blessing to his daughter and the athletic John.

THE MEXICAN'S FAITH.—Tony Perez, a Mexican cowpuncher, is driven from the ranch where he is employed for some misdemeanor or other, and after vainly endeavoring to find work trusn into the gate of Dan Farman's ranch, "The Mosquito," and applies for a job. His hard luck story rings true and old Dan, who is of a charitable turn, puts the Mexican to work.

Alice Farman, the daughter and "flower of the ranch," is in love with Nat Michaels, the ranch foreman. Perez, who has seen Alice from time to time, becomes deeply infatuated with the girl, and one day when he encounters her alone, he voices his passionate love. The girl shakes her head and scorns him. Perez then insults the girl and attempts to kiss her. A darkey servant, who has been near, sees this, and running to the bunkhouse, summons a number of cowboys.

Alice, raging with indignation, tells them that the Mexican had insulted her. The mounted cowboys ask where Perez has gone and when she indicates that he has run to his cabin, they ride off in that direction, telling her they will attend to the "dirty greaser."

An hour later they return, with the despairing Mexican their prisoner. He is lashed to hitching post, while one of the cowboys summons Alice. The Mexican is sentenced to a fearful horse-whipping and Alice is invited to administer the lashes. But she revolts against this brutal treatment. The Mexican begs for mercy and finally she forces the cowboys to release him. Perez is immediately reformed and bcomes a most faithful and valuable servant.

Several weeks elapse and Dick Chalmers, an Easterner, arrives at the ranch. He falls in love with Alice, but each proposal he makes is refused by her. The girl at last is forced to confess to her fiancee the annoying attentions paid her by Chalmers, and Michaels, very indignant, tells her that he will make short work of the Easterner if he persist in his insults toward her.

Chalmers, who is "black" clean through, resolves to have Alice at any price. He engages a Mexican greaser to help him and together they kidnap the girl and carry her to a deserted cabin. Tony Perez, however, has followed them to the cabin and overpowering the Mexican, who is acting as sentinel at the door, rushes into the shack in time to spare Alice from any further indignities at the hands of Chalmers.

Perez's knife flashes and would have made quick work of Chalmers had Alice not interfered. Tony understands and draws back, slipping the knife into its sheath. Then Chalmers, realizing his narrow escape, hastily rises and slinks out of the cabin. Tony sinks on his knee and kisses the girl's hand. He has kept the faith.

THE ENTERPRISING CLERK.—Employed at the glove counter of a big department store, Jones is engaged in trying on a pair of gloves on the withered hands of a lady of uncertain age, when suddenly there stops at his counter a blooming rose of beauty, the sight of whom takes away the breath of poor susceptible Jones. He immediately drops his customer's hand and rushes over to see what the beauty wants. Taking her hand in his to judge the size, Jones cannot resist the temptation of imprinting a kiss on its smooth, white surface, for which impertinence he immediately receives a slap in his face, which almost takes him off his feet. The floor walker is called and dismisses the audacious clerk on the spot. The latter calls to see the customer whom he has offended, and tries to explain to her that it was her beauty that made him lose his head for the moment. (For Jones is a sly fox and knows how to get around the gentler sex.) The woman, however, seems very indignant and, showing him her husband's portrait, orders him out of the house. But Jones continues to plead in his own behalf, when just at that moment the woman's husband, a dignified looking lawyer, comes in, and she quickly hides Jones in the wood chest. As luck would have it, he is scarcely in the box when somebody dumps a whole load of wood on him and almost kills him. The woman fortunately has now induced her husband to go upstairs and take a nap, but he does not sleep long, and again she is compelled to hide Jones as he bursts in on them. This time she pushes him in the bathroom, where he accidentally touches the tap which turns on the needle bath and poor Jones gets a ducking. The woman is at her wits' end as her husband expresses his intention to take a shower; so, pretending to be suddenly seized with hysterics, she sends him flying for the salts and thus gives Jones a chance to escape. This is Jones' unlucky day, however. He jumps out of the window and into the one of the adjoining house, where he finds something to drink, and is soon hopelessly intoxicated and is arrested as a burglar. As fate would have it, the husband of the woman who has caused all his misfortune tries his case and pleads so hard for his client that Jones is acquitted. This being the first case the young lawyer has won, he invites the happy Jones to his house and introduces him to his wife, and they all have a great old time.

DRUIDIC REMAINS IN BRITTANY.—Of all the old provinces of France, Brittany, the subject of this picture, is the most curious and interesting, as she rises before us with her coast strewn with rocks against which the waves beat incessantly. The remains of the altars built by the ancient Druids still stand surrounded by enormous stones that in those days were looked upon almost as gods by these ancient Celtic priests.

CARMEN.—This picturesque narrative of Spain, from the magic pen of the brilliant writer, Posper Merimee, and set to music by the immortal Bizet, is the subject now presented in film d'art form. Madame Lepanto as Carmen, typifies the description of the Spanish girl.

Don Jose Navarro, a Basque, and a Christian of the ancient type, had enlisted in the cavalry regiment of Almanza and was on duty at the tobacco factory in Seville where four or five hundred girls were employed in rolling cigars. As the bell rings for the girls to return to their work the young men watch them as they pass. One, a handsome, merry-looking girl, the beauty of the place and known to all as "La Carmencita," struts by the line of admiring men. Don Jose being a quiet sort of fellow, is not much attracted at first by the saucy-looking beauty, who, not accustomed to being ignored, asked Navarro to give her the chain he is fashioning out of some brass wire. Navarro replied that he could not, as he was making it for a certain purpose, whereupon she took the flower from her mouth and struck him in the face with it, much to the amusement of all the others. As Carmen passed on, Navarro, when no one was looking, stooped and picked up the flower and put it in his pocket.

Two or three hours after this incident a porter rushed into the guard house saying that one of the factory girls had been murdered. With several of his comrades Don Jose hurried to the factory, where he beheld a wounded woman lying on the floor and recognized Carmen in the grasp of five or six of her companions. When the wounded girl beheld the soldiers, she accused Carmen, who stood with a defiant expression on her face. Don Jose's duty was plain; he must arrest the girl, so taking her gently by the arm (she being a woman) he bound her hands behind her and placed her under arrest. The wily gypsy asked for her mantilla and then started off with Don Jose. On the way she turned and asked him in a childlike tone where he was taking her. Don Jose, determined to do his duty, answered that he was taking her to prison. Upon which she begged and pleaded with him to have mercy. Soon, therefore, when they come to a narrow lane, with one thrust of her tiny hand she gives Don Jose a push, and he obligingly falls back and his prisoner hopping over his prostrate body regains her liberty. Navarro is compelled to return to the guard house without succeeding in locating her, and consequently is reduced to the ranks and imprisoned for a month. While he is in prison his keeper comes to him one day with a loaf of bread, which he said was sent him by his cousin. Navarro knows very well that he has no cousin in Seville and immediately suspects that Carmen is responsible for the loaf of bread. As he attempts to cut it his knife strikes something hard and he finds that a small English file has been placed in the dough before it was baked. He also finds two piastres with which Carmen evidently intended him to purchase a civilian's coat, and also a note from Carmen telling him to meet her at Lillas Pastia's. Thanks to the gypsy girl's thoughtfulness, Navarro escapes and finds his love waiting for him at the old gypsy eating house. Well, the end of it all is that Carmen has decided to persuade Navarro to join a band of smugglers. At first he would not listen to it, but finally out of love for the girl he consented. For his devotion, however, the fickle beauty repays him by flirting with other admirers, thus making Don Jose most unhappy. She had at this time become acquainted with a very handsome and skilful picador named Lucas. One day one of his comrades told him that he saw Carmen in a shop with Lucas and Navarro became inflamed and questioned the girl, who confessed her love for the picador, at the same time tearing off her finger a ring Don Jose had given her. The latter, unable any longer to control his rage, strikes her a deadly blow with his knife and then remains with arm uplifted as if turned to stone as he gazes down on the huddled up little figure of the woman he had so passionately loved.

THE LITTLE BEGGAR.—A thinly clad pinched looking tot stands begging on the street corner. A good natured looking woman stops for a moment to speak to the child and her heart is touched as she hears the little one mutter, "I'm so hungry." By this time some other pedestrians have also stopped as they see the woman talking to the little beggar and when she turns and tells them that the child is starving they also are moved to pity and the woman soon collects quite a sum for the beggar. We next see the child outside a fashionable cafe. Seeing a prosperous looking man coming out of the place she timidly goes towards him and puts out her little thin hand, but he only pushes her roughly aside and hurries on. Some other diners having witnessed the incident take pity on the little one and each and every one gives her coin. The next scene holds for us a great surprise as we see the trio, the good natured working woman, the prosperous looking diner and the little beggar standing before their waiting automobile counting the day's earnings. For these three belong to that class of despicable frauds who live on the kind-heartedness of others and who have become wealthy from the money gained in this contemptible way.

A PANICKY PICNIC.—Never again a picnic in the woods for theirs! This one disastrous experience has been enough to cure our friends of any longing they might have for jaunts in the country. They expected to rough it, but never dreamed they would be compelled to put up with the hardships that they suffered on this pleasure trip. In the first place, when they opened their carefully prepared lunch, they found it crawling with all sorts of worms, etc., and then to add to their troubles, a shower comes on, and, possessing but one umbrella, they naturally get good and wet. On reaching the hotel, they finally expect to get a little rest, but as they seek a little slumber the most terrible nightmares disturb their repose until they finally decide to give it up as a bad job, and hasten back to town, perfect wrecks after their day with Nature.

THREE QUEENS AND A JACK.—A good looking impecunious youth, hounded to death by his creditors, decides to get out of his difficulties by marrying an heiress. The owner of the estate adjoining his, a man of many millions, has a very handsome daughter, and when we see her for the first time in her beautiful country home, she is welcoming two of her old boarding school friends who have come to pay her a visit. The impecunious youth comes to pay his respects and is invited to a garden party given in the young girls honor. He soon finds himself in a terrible predicament for he cannot decide which of the girls to choose, as they are all equally pretty, but he is anxious to secure the richest. Two of the girls finding that they are both in love with the same young man, decide that they must settle matters by fighting a duel. So we see them meet early one morning by the water with their seconds and soon show themselves most excellent swordswomen. It does not take the friends long, however, to discover their handsome neighbor's duplicity, and to realize that he is playing fast and loose with them, so all three decide to play a trick on him. They send him a note which is supposed to be written by a young widow who is both handsome and wealthy, saying that she has seen him and his fallen in love with him and as she is rich in her own right, there is nothing to prevent their joining hands if he finds her to his liking. The letter ends up by telling him to meet her at midnight at the summer house. The girls lie in wait and watch the young man as he approaches the heavily veiled figure waiting patiently for him. Gently lifting her veil he starts back as a black face smiles up at him, for the girls had dressed up one of the negresses on the place to give the youth the lesson he deserves. Rushing from their hiding place they surround the crestfallen beau, who hurries away in a rage that he has allowed himself to be so trapped.

FATE AGAINST HIM.—George Carr has been unfortunate enough to fall in love with and marry an empty-headed doll, who after she had spent all his fortune left him for another who was still in a position to satisfy all her whims. Broken hearted and ambitionless now that he has lost both love and money, he leads a Bohemian life, thinking only of the present. Happening to be strolling in the country one night his attention is drawn to two suspicious looking ruffians hanging around a handsome villa that stands near the road. As he watches the men the door of the house is opened and a young woman leaning on the arm of a handsome man steps out. Carr is stupefied for a moment for the young woman is none other than his false wife, but he has little time to give to his own feelings for the ruffians have jumped from their hiding place and attacked the young couple, who were it not for the interference of the onlooker would have been killed by the desperate men. He is the one who receives the death blow, however, and as another proof of the devotion he bears to the unfaithful woman whom he has never ceased to love, dies at her feet in an attempt to save her life.

INDUSTRIES OF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA.—Pigeon Farming.—It is hard to conceive a more valuable and convincing subject than a picture of animal farming, taking as we do the cultivation and domesticating of wild animals that are produced as a commercial asset.

Alligator Farming.—From the antics of the little pigeon, we are transferred to the Los Angeles alligator farm, showing the removal of the eggs from the pond—the sorting and handling of the young—the modes of handling without danger, the greatest of water animals.

Ostrich Farming.—Then comes the industry that has made California paramount in the eyes of the world—cultivation on the largest scale of the bird known as the ostrich, exceeding in size all other birds of the universe and furnishing as it does millions of dollars worth of valuable plumage.

PAID IN FULL.—A young officer of the French army, while crossing the Libyan Desert with a detachment of soldiers, is lost in a typhoon. He staggers on blindly through the storm of wind and sand until maddened and famished. Hope gone, he falls exhausted into an Arab's tent pitched in an oasis. The Arab, with the assistance of his wife, nurses the young officer back to life and strength.

Secretly the young Frenchman makes love to the Arab's wife and, winning her affections, he induces her, during the absence of her husband, to run away with him. After taking a large amount of money belonging to her husband, they flee to Algiers, where, with the stolen money, they live in comparative luxury.

The Arab returns to his tent and finds it deserted, divines the cause and immediately makes up his mind to go in pursuit of the fugitives.

While living in Algiers with the Arabian woman, the French officer receives a telegram announcing the death in Paris of a wealthy uncle, who has left him a large fortune. He decides to leave his mistress and go at once to Paris. The Arabian woman pleads with him to take her. He reviles and deserts her. Realizing her wretched condition, with the desperation of a woman scorned, she takes poison. Just as she is reeling and falling from its effects, her husband stealthily enters a window and catches her in his arms, where she expires after he forgives her. He swears to pay in full the ingratitude and villainy of the Frenchman. True to his word, he follows him to Paris and like a Nemesis from place to place to Monte Carlo, where, face to face on a lonely path overlooking the rocky steeps of Monaco Bay, he calls to account the object of his vengeance and, in the fury of his wrath, throws him over the stone wall to the crags below, where he is dashed to death.

THE LESSON BY THE SEA.—While spending her Summer at a seashore resort, a very pretty young woman is thrown into the society of two popular and dashing young fellows with whom, during her husband's absence, she innocently and thoughtlessly takes strolls and frolics along the rock bound coast. One day, while they are far out upon some rocks during the ebb of the sea, unconscious of time or tide, they find when it is time to return homeward that the water has risen and they are unable to reach the mainland.

One of the young fellows volunteers to carry the young woman safely to the shore. As there is no alternative, she reluctantly accepts his offer, and, while he is carrying her through the water, his companion, who carries a camera, takes a "snapshot" of the young woman in the young man's arms heedless of her protests.

Some time after this adventure, the young fellows, trying their luck in a game of chance, lose their money and "go broke." Financially embarrassed, at their wit's end, they decide to use the "snapshot" of the young woman as a means of blackmail in order to recoup their fortunes. They send her a letter threatening to tell her husband of her escapade unless she gives them a certain amount of "hush money."

Upon receipt of this letter, the young woman realizes how foolish and indiscreet she has been. Fearful of consequences, she excitedly lays the letter on the table, searches in her pocketbook, and, as a last resort, determines to give her jewels to still the voice of scandal. Just as she is in the act of putting her determination into effect, her husband enters the room, notices her excitement and discovers the blackmailing letter. He is surprised and shocked to think that his wife had so foolishly compromised herself. She explains all to him and confesses how unwise she had been.

Her husband at once decides upon action. He tells her that he will disguise himself in her storm coat, take the jewels and meet her traducers at the time and place appointed in the letter. The young men are awaiting the coming of their victim, and, as the husband approaches in his disguise, come forward, and one of them is taking the jewels from his hand when he quickly throws off the cloak and administers to each of the two rascals a severe drubbing, from which they are glad to escape with their lives. The husband returns home and tells his wife what he did. She humbly begs forgiveness for her thoughtless indiscretion, which he readily grants, satisfied that she will never forget the lesson by the sea.

THE SOUL OF VENICE.—A Venetian nobleman has made up his mind that his daughter must marry the man of his choice, who is a wealthy prince. The daughter is in love with a Venetian poet and musician, and, while she appears to be submissive to her father's wishes, evidently has a mind of her own, which she displays in the beginning of the story in an interview with her father, who angrily leaves the room. No sooner has he gone thane the minstrel lover appears at the window and enters, clasps his sweetheart to his breast and tries to induce her to elope with him.

They hear footsteps approaching, and the young poet hastily leaves by the window through which he entered. Her father and the Prince make their appearance. The Prince advances to caress the girl and she shrinks from him. Her father insists upon her betrothal at once and reluctantly she exits on the arm of her fiancee. At the betrothal feast, while everybody else is happy, she sits sad and listless until her lover, the musician, enters and takes his place assigned for the musicians. While singing and playing upon his harp, his soul goes out to her and hers to him until, overcome with emotion, she is led from the hall and the guests are dismissed.

The young lover crosses the bridge of the Grand Canal, while the guests enter their gondolas for their homes. When all is quiet, the lover returns playing and singing softly beneath the window of his beloved, who appears at the lattice listening to his ardent pleadings to come to him. She can not resist and hurries from the house enveloped in cloak and veil. As they are entering a gondola, her father, with the affianced Prince, come suddenly upon them, and, while the girl is seized by her father, the lover struggles with the Prince until he is arrested and cast into prison by the officers, who are attracted by the disturbance.

Again the father, in the presence of the Prince, insists upon his daughter's marriage, and, at the same time apologizing to the Prince for her stubbornness and opposition. Rather than marry against her own soul's desire, she decides to become a nun and appeals to the Abbess of the convent, where her father finds her and takes her home with him.

The lover is languishing in prison when he receives word that the Doge, or ruler, of Venice has offered a prize for the best poetical composition which will best express the soul or thought of Venice. The poet at once becomes absorbed in thought and passes into the realms of fancy and dreams of the festival of Neptune, and in the vision a beautiful girl, like a swaying reed, wafted by gentle zephyrs, dances in rhythmic motion before him, while he plays sweet music on his lute. Awakening from his sleep, he finds his harp beside him and at once composes the inspiration of his dream.

The day of the contest for the Doge's prize has arrived, and, surrounded by his staff and courtiers, among whom is the nobleman and his daughter, the ruler of Venice is ready to listen to the contestants and pass upon their efforts. One after another of the competitors play and sing until the young poet is brought before the assemblage in his prison chains. Aflame with the fire of his genius, he inspires all present with the spirit of his theme and wins the prize. The Doge orders the chains removed from the young man's feet and gives him his freedom. To the Doge's prize is added another of far greater value. The father of his sweetheart congratulates him and gives him his daughter in marriage.

THE GOVERNOR'S PARDON.—She is alone in the world, and on her deathbed; can human misfortune be more terrible? We say alone; her husband is alive, but he is a convict in prison under a life sentence, and the anguish of being unable to see him is hastening her end. A kindly physician is comforting her in her last moments, when suddenly with a supreme effort she sits up and asks for the minister. The doctor hastens on the errand, and soon reaches the parson's little home, where the latter is enjoying a quiet evening with his wife and little daughter. The good man promptly answers the call of the sufferer and goes to the squalid home.

After administering to her she asks for a paper, and with the little strength yet left, writes a note begging the Governor to allow her last wish before meeting her Maker—to release her husband for an hour. The parson hurries off and gains an audience with the Governor, but the request is gently but firmly denied—it cannot be done.

To the bedside he goes and tells her to be comforted for hope is not lost, and right here he decides upon a daring ruse in the name of mercy. Surely the prison authorities will not deny a minister the privilege of visiting a convict. He is right, they do not; and in a moment he is alone with the prisoner. Now for the trick: They quickly change clothing and on the convict's mere promise to return, the parson remains in the cell, while the other easily passes the keepers. He reaches his wife's bedside just in time—her last wish has been answered, she smiles bravely—and breathes her last. He stands the shock and, gathering himself together, starts back to prison. But he is still a stranger to sunlight from his long incarceration, and as he attempts to cross a broad roadway he is struck by an automobile and instantly killed.

We are now taken back to the cell, where the minister is wondering whether the convict will keep his word—he is gone so long. Another scene shows us his wife and daughter at home very much worried about his absence. In his striped suit, he is anxiously waiting when a passing guard gets a glimpse of his face and discovers the substitution. He is marched into the office and while he tells his story the clerk sees a headline in the newspaper just out, telling of the death by auto of "an unknown man in prison garb." The wife at home, too, reads of it, and she is prostrated. The prison officials realize the situation and the Governor is communicated with. He visits the prison, sees the minister and, congratulating him on his noble sacrifice, frees him.

The good man goes home, where glad hearts greet him—it's all in the day's work.

NICK CARTER AS ACROBAT.—Our little heroine is playing happily in her father's garden utterly unconscious of the danger approaching her. Presently a party of evil looking gypsies pass by. One of these seeing the beautiful child, steals into the garden unobserved, snatches up the little girl, and before she has recovered from her amazement and fright has disappeared with her. The parents upon discovering that their daughter is missing, immediately employ the services of the famous Nick Carter to aid them in the search for their lost darling. For a time all efforts seem vain. However, the great detective learns that there is a Bohemian circus giving performances near the town, and conceives the idea that very probably the child has been stolen by these gypsies, to be trained for their profession. He immediately sets to work to devise a means of ascertaining whether his surmises are correct.

We next see our friend Carter and his assistant disguised as clowns on their way to present themselves to the manager of the circus, purporting to seek employment. The manager is greatly pleased with the clowns and noting their extreme cleverness engages them, as he sees great possibilities of success with the addition of their unusual talent.

The moment for the performances arrives; the eager crowds throng in to the circus drawn thither by the flourishing advertisement of the wonderful new acquisition. At this opportune time, Carter, who has been on the lookout for a clue, discovers that the manager wears a coat from which a piece of cloth has been torn. He immediately compares a piece of material which was found on the garden wall after the child had been kidnapped, and then finds that it matches the coat exactly, and also that the piece would properly supply the deficiency in the coat. The next minute Carter's assistant appears with the child, whom he has found after an energetic and somewhat difficult search throughout the place. Carter then puts into execution a most original plan for the capture of the entire company and the child is happily restored to the joyful parents.

CASTLES ON THE RHINE.—We have all listened on sundry occasions to the legends and tales of the wonderful Rhine. How enchanting the tradition of the beautiful Lorelei and how thrilling the innumerable stories of the iron willed Barons, and their horror of horrors—"Round Towers on the Rhine." We view, as we gaze, the strange blending together in one grand panorama, and the magnitude of the changeless beauty of old nature, and the glories and picturesque, yet transient splendor of the handiwork of man.

GREAT NORTHERN.

RUINED BY HIS SON.—Old Squire Drake, who for some time has been in ill health, is ordered by his physician to take a long sea voyage to regain his strength. Before leaving, he appoints his eldest son, Tom, to look after and manage the estate during his absence. The young man, however, has a different conception of duty and care than that of his father, and the old squire has hardly departed before the son starts to live a life of extreme extravagance. Friends are asked to dinners and entertainments where the most expensive things are served. Neither his mother nor sister can induce him to discontinue his extravagant ways, and after a few weeks the money and also the credit of the old squire are gone. There is nothing now for the young man to do but to mortgage the property, and after this has been done, there being nothing more to turn into money, the whole estate is taken possession of by the creditors. The day arrives when the old squire returns from his journey. Full of sorrow, the old man realizes what his son has done, and he refuses to have anything more to do with him. Tired of the reckless life, the son makes up his mind to end it, but the daughter of a neighbor, who has always loved him, induces him to leave the country and go to America, and lead a better life. This he agrees to do, on the condition that she will become his wife and go with him. She accepts this offer and they both depart for America, where her good influence and character help him to become a good man, and after several years they return to their old home, the possessors of considerable wealth. Remembering the misery which he had caused his old father, the son now does everything in his power to make up for it. He has sufficient money and buys the old estate back again, and turns it over to the father, as a compensation for all the wrong he has done and the misery he has caused.

FOR HER FATHER'S HONOR.—Rose Ranson, daughter of Robert Ranson, a wealthy ranch owner, is starting on a ride to meet Hal Blake, the man she loves. Mexican Pete, a gambler, offers to escort her. Refusing and ignoring his offer, she rides away. Robert Ranson appears and Pete suggests a friendly game of poker. During the game the Mexican has the better luck of the two, winning $20,000. Ranson, growing desperate, writes upon a card: "I. O. U. my ranch, stock and all against your $20,000." Mexican Pete consents to make the gamble. While the dealing of the cards takes place, Pete takes two cards from his sleeve, substituting them for the cards he had drawn, winning the "pot." Red Eye, an Indian, is the only one in the room who has seen the Mexican's trick, but he does not say anything about it at the time. The next day Mexican Pete comes to Ranson proposing to return the "I. O. U." in exchange for the hand of his daughter in marriage. Ranson weakly resents the proposition, but Rose decides to sacrifice herself to save her father's ranch. Bidding her father good-bye, she starts off with Pete for the office of the Justice of the Peace, to be married. Rose sends Red Eye with a note to Hal Blake, telling of her sacrifice and that she is on her way to be married. Red Eye upon finding Hal, tells him of the Mexican's way of playing cards. Hal then summons the cowboys, who give chase after the Mexican and Rose, arriving just as the Justice of the Peace is about to make them man and wife. Hal, rushing in, stops the services and forces the Mexican to admit he had cheated in the poker game. Turning to Rose, Hal asks her if she still loves him. Rose, looking into his face, says: "You have saved me from a life of misery, I am yours forever."

IRON ARM'S REMORSE.—In a picturesque canyon of the Rockies, Iron Arm, a young Indian chief, accidentally discovers a rich gold mine; this is overseen by Blake, a gambler and desperado, who plans with the Indian to buy the ranch on which the mine is located from its poor owner who knows nothing of it.

The two schemers grow rich from the mine, but the Indian is unhappy for he has grown to love the beautiful daughter of the swindled owner. While dividing profits this letter arrives:

Jackson Blake:

Sir We thought you and Iron Arm honest, but find you knew of the mine and robbed us. We are starving and to be dispossessed tomorrow. Do what is honest. ANNA BLAKE.

The gambler laughs and his merriment only ceases when he sees Iron Arm tenderly kissing the letter. "You fool," sneered Blake, tearing the letter into fragments. "Never a cent will they get from me." "Dog of a paleface," roared the chief, "she shall have my share." Blake smiled but his expression changes as he is hurled heavily to the floor. A terrific struggle ensues, but the Indian chokes Blake into insensibility, seizes half of the treasure, and hastily mounts a broncho. Blake feebly struggles to his knees and fires a pistol at him. Iron Arm smiles defiance and gal-dops madly off while the sheriff and a band of cowboys rush from the saloon, and as the pain convulsed swindler tells of the assault, and as he falsely terms it robbery, the rough riding crowd with waving of lassoes and brandished firearms mount their horses and follow the disappearing Indian. The shades of night fall in the gloomy recesses of a primeval forest as Iron Arm gallops up and hides the treasure. He hears his trackers and rides away. Once on the prairie they sight him and a stern chase is on. Over the boundless stretches of the far Western plains, through rock strewn and almost impassable canyons and around the mighty trunks of forest monarchs he is trailed and is about to escape when he is lassoed and his horse dragged to his haunches. The band enraged at his stubborn resistance, would punish him, but the sheriff protects him. Iron Arm cleverly escapes, regains the treasure and rides with the speed of the wind to the rescue of the girl he loves. The family who have been dispossessed are shivering in the street when Iron Arm appears, gives them the gold and after taking a last loving farewell he goes away and is seen no more, for, disgusted with the treachery of the palefaces, he returns to his tribe.

THE VINDICTIVE FOREMAN.—Fred Stafford's foreman had been sick for two weeks now and still no hope for his return, so when Anton Cyernay applied for the position, telling the contractor a pitiable tale of hard luck, but that he was a thoroughly competent man, Stafford engaged him at once, and in truth his work proved him to be all he claimed.

When the generous contractor learned that he was a stranger in the city, he promptly invited Cyernay to stay with him until he could find comfortable quarters. Thus he met gracious Mary Stafford. Scarcely two weeks had passed ere he was madly in love with her and resolved to move heaven and earth to possess her.

Returning early one afternoon he grasped the opportunity to declare his love, and it was not until she had broken a vase over his head and denounced him to her husband who fortunately had returned opportunely, that Cyernay realized that her scorn and indignation were real and that she was lost to him forever.

The Hungarian was half crazed with rage—this woman had not only tricked him into falling in love with her and then scorned him but had allowed him to be soundly thrashed by her husband and discharged from his position—he would be revenged, but how?

All night he planned, and in the morning when he knew that her husband would have gone to business and their young son to school, he set about putting his diabolical plan into execution.

Entering the house by stealth, he finds Mrs. Stafford seated in a chair sewing; approaching her from behind he seizes, gags and binds her to the mantel, and then fastening a shotgun to the table pointed directly at Mrs. Stafford, he arranges a cord in such a manner that by fastening it to the door, the gun will be discharged the moment the door is opened and cause the instant death of his victim.

Writing a message to her husband to come home at once as his wife is dying and signing the name of the family doctor, he taunts his victim and shows her the letter, then locks all the doors except the one to which the gun is attached.

He hires a boy to deliver the message, then he hides near at hand to watch the outcome of his diabolical scheme.

Scarcely has he gone when the postman arrives with a registered letter, and getting no reply to the door bell, is about to try the door when he discovers that he is at the wrong number and departs.

The grocery wagon arrives and the boy, getting no reply at the back door comes around to the front and is about to enter when his horse takes fright at a child running in front of it and darts up the street pursued by the boy.

The child that startled the horse happened to be Roy, son of Mrs. Stafford, fleeing from the wrath of Spiltzer the grocer, whose fruit stand he had patronized for the pleasure of little Louise, and being unable to pay had fled with Spiltzer and a mob in close pursuit, and gaining his own yard he attempted to enter by the back door, but finding it locked and not daring to attempt the front entrance, he climbs in through a window and hastening through to the front of the house to reconnoitre.

Seeing a mob he believes to be his pursuers rushing toward the front door, he hastily bolts it, thereby unconsciously saving his mother's life, as his father was already bounding up the steps and in another moment would have opened the door.

Being unable to open the doors, the father followed his son's example and climbed through a window.

His horror upon discovering what Cyerany had planned can be better seen on the screen than described.

Quickly releasing and reviving his wife, he had the satisfaction of seeing Cyernay arrested and led away to receive his deserts at the hands of the law, as his wife would not permit him to wreak summary vengeance.

THE FISHERMAN'S HONOR.—This is a beautiful portrayal of the honor of a fisherman. The scene opens up showing the fisherman kissing his wife good-bye, while he starts out for the day's work. Next we find the fisherman and son at work down by the water when suddenly a number of fugitives who are trying to escape from the Royalists come along and ask the fisherman if he could tell them of a good hiding place where the enemy would not be able to find them. The fisherman being sympathetic and kind leads them to a place in the woods.

After the fisherman returns home the Royalists, who are looking for the fugitives, come to the house of the fisherman and claim that he knows something of the whereabouts of the fugitives whom they are looking for. The fisherman declines the betrayal of his secret and commands his son to keep silent when the soldiers question him.

We then see the son fishing alone when a number of Royalists approach him and ask him about the whereabout of the fugitives. He refuses to tell them anything at first, but they try to bribe him by offering him gold. The sight of the money so captivates the boy that he accepts same and shows them the hiding place of the fugitives. The Royalists surround the place and force the fugitives to either surrender or take a chance in making their escape.

Next we see the boy returning home acting rather queer. His father noticing his strange actions questions him but doesn't get any satisfaction. Just at this moment we see one of the fugitives run by the house and is shot right in front of the door. The father seeing this immediately realizes that they had been found at their hiding place and suspects his son.

He enters the house to find his son counting the gold which was given him for the betrayal of the secret. The fisherman feels his honor compels him to take the life of his son, and so informs the boy that he must die. The boy kneels down and pleads with the father, but all in vain. He takes the boy to a lonely spot and there, after commanding his son to pray to his God, is on the verge of shooting him when his mother appears. She steps between the father and son, telling the father that if he takes her son's life he must take hers also. This softens the fisherman's heart and he forgives his son.

LAEMMLE! LAEMMLE! LAEMMLE!

Everybody says "Laemmle is the backbone of the Independent movement." To live up to that reputation I've got to give the customers of the Laemmle Film Service a better lot of Independent pictures to select from than any other house gives. Not only that. I've got to give every one of my customers a better service than I gave him before I became Independent! And bless your heart and soul and gizzard, I'm doing that very thing. I'll admit there was a time a few months ago when I had to sweat blood to give a high class Independent service. But now it's a cinch, a pipe, a snap. Why? Simply because the Independent manufacturers are fairly bursting their inners to produce high class films—they're doing it every day in the week. It simply resolves itself into a question of buying enough of these reels to keep my customers pleased and you can bet your bottom simoleon I'm attending to all that! If you want an Independent service that will increase your business, slip me a note.

INDEPENDENT MOVING PICTURES CO. IMP OF AMERICA

Independent exhibitors and renters will go fairly wild with delight when they see the two reels to be released by the "Imp" on March 7th and March 10th. You will hear of these two masterpieces for weeks, months and years to come, for I give you my word they are the best released by anybody during the past year at least. All former "Imps" put together, popular as they were, did not make the tremendous ten-strike that these two will make. Get them if you have to fight! Here they are:—

"Mother Love"

Released Monday, March 7th Length about 980 feet

In this picture Miss Lawrence, known to thousands as "Mrs. Jones," does the most excellent of her remarkable career. She enacts the role of a young mother whose reason has been temporarily dethroned by the death of her baby. Her insanity takes the form of failure to recognize her own husband and her artistry is so powerful that you will never forget it. The efforts of her friends to restore her to reason form the greatest series of dramatic events ever pictured on a screen. The story has a happy finale, so that no dark brown taste is left in your mouth. Have I ever given you a wrong tip? No? Very well, then, take it from me that you MUST have this "Mother Love" picture. Talk about your films d'art! This is a film d'peach, film d'great, a film d'magnifique!!!

"The Devotion of Women"

Released Thursday, March 10th Length about 960 feet

Here's another story of the Indian Northland as powerful as that wonderful Imp film, "Justice in the Far North." And again I swear that David Belasco didn't stage it, though you'll swear he did. A young adventurer, temporarily infatuated with a squaw, finally leaves her and returns to his home and wife. An Indian follows him, there is a quarrel and the white man is wounded. Then follows enough excitement to satisfy the most fastidious. And it is the squaw who finally settles things and leaves the man and wife happily reunited. It is intensely dramatic and powerful from soda to hock. Get it!

Meanwhile, don't forget "THE DEATH OF MINNEHAHA," the star reel released February 24th. Sequel to our great "Hiawatha."

THE GOLF MANIA

(COMEDY) LENGTH, 400 FEET

It looks like something serious this time, for ever since the dear old Dad gave up sport he has declared that it would be a big thing that attracted him next time. Last week he had a chronic attack of gout and every other ailment combined and poor Ma was quite worried about him. There he sat growling and groaning all day long until at last when trying to kick the cat in his vexation he collapsed altogether. Mother then summoned her friend, Knowall, M.D., etc., etc., and he said Pa must have plenty of fresh air and play golf. That settled it, and we soon procured a fine set for him. Pa and Ma then sallied forth to the links. Unhappily, just as they were going out they thought to try a shot just to set them right. Then they went fairly mad over it. Out of the house they went, cutting and slashing away at the little, harmless white balls. Old trooper caught the craze. He was one of those who rode into the valley of death and into—oh, the rest does not apply to him, as he did not get there. He came back without his head, so he was kindly supplied with a wooden one, which served the same purpose. Pa is thinking of putting up for Parliament now and hopes to pass an act which will do the cinematograph trade some good.

MARCH 2nd

THE SAILOR'S DOG

(DRAMATIC) LENGTH, 590 FEET

This is a fine film of a dog's sagacity. A jolly Jack Tar is sent on a confidential mission, but after the manner of his kind meets some pals, and when his tongue becomes loosened by the wine, tells of his mission. He was overheard by some hooligans, who waylay him. In his drunken fury he kicks his faithful dog, who is accompanying him. Just after he is attacked, stabbed and robbed of his letters and thrown into the sea. After lying in the sea for some time, he is discovered by his dog, who goes and fetches some fishermen to assist him homeward. Upon reaching home and recovering consciousness, the sailor sets his dog to track the thieves. When the dog discovers them, an exciting chase ensues, and at last the thieves are apprehended. The dog in the meantime finds the last bag and carries it to his master in his mouth.

WHO?
Nailed the Flag Up--First

Was it the Daring Peary? Or the Intrepid Doctor Cook?
Somebody had to be first: Which of these two nervy and patriotic Americans was it?

As a people we are about equally divided Some say Cook and stick to it. Others are equally emphatic in proclaiming that it was Peary.

The point is that there is a discussion about it in which all the people in this country are very vitally interested.

Now Mr. M. P. Exhibitor please apply this fact to your own business.

In your town there is, or ought to be, one theatre catering to the whims, peculiarities, tastes and desires of the Motion Picture going public.

To fully satisfy their wants you must have PREMIER FILM SERVICE.

Make no mistake about it—don't "kid" yourself into believing that by the use of inferior and unbalanced Film Service you can retain their patronage and become a "successful one."

Those days exist no more and since OUR SERVICE is now open for your town—why not assure yourself against a Cook-Peary-like controversy and be the first to install a successful service Uniformed Employees.

In former numbers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD we have advocated the dressing of the attaches of the theater in suitable uniforms, and it is now the rule instead of the exception in all first-class houses. Even many of the smaller places have uniformed doormen and ushers, and we doubt if there is anything that adds more to the tone of the theater. Smart-looking uniforms are not expensive and will improve the appearance of any doorkeeper or usher, no matter how handsome he may be. We have interested some outfitters to make a specialty of uniforms for moving picture employees and their cards will be found in the advertising pages. We bespeak for them the patronage of our readers, because we believe that by showing good taste in the apparel of the people who handle their patrons, they will not only make their places more attractive, but they will be doing something that will tend to elevate the general public impression of the moving picture show. One thing in favor of the uniformed usher is that he is easily singled out by any patron of the theater who may require his services, and it also imparts to them a certain amount of dignity which, if they are of the right sort, they will strive to maintain —for it seems to be incumbent upon all people to respect a uniform. We would like to hear from those of our readers who have uniformed employees, and will consider offering a prize for the neatest uniformed and best looking group of employees photographed in front of a moving picture theater entrance.

Sporadic Outbursts of Virtue.

The persecution of the moving picture is like a mild disease which attacks the most susceptible, but is not contagious, and gradually subsides to break out again in some other section of the community. At present it is prevalent in Cincinnati, Ohio, where it has affected especially the members of the Humane Society.

Now what the functions of this organization may be is beyond us to decipher from the title, but they evidently desire to do something as an excuse for their existence, and this ambition is in itself praiseworthy. But it puzzles us to discover what there is that is inhumane about a moving picture show other than that it is the most popular amusement of the people and therefore the most available means to bring the Humane Society into the limelight.

It is equally mysterious what will be the nature of the onslaught, but Mr. A. B. Williams, Jr., general agent of the society, is quoted as saying: "Our crusade against show concerns which display improper films will be productive of results." What form the crusade would take he was not in a position to say, "but we will surely bring about a betterment in the present conditions."

So let us welcome the crusaders into the ranks of film manufacturers, distributing agents and exhibitors who are all plugging along, equally earnestly if less ostentatiously, in a constant effort to better conditions. More power to the crusaders if their efforts are for the betterment of humanity and their zeal is tempered with good judgment!

But there is one statement credited to the leader of the crusaders to which we must take exception. He says: "We have facts to back us up in the reform we are undertaking. We have made visits to different moving picture shows and found that the biggest majority of them depicted either immorality, drunkenness, murder or suicide." Now we are loth to believe that the Cleveland exhibitors are so far behind the times as to discard the regular releases of the manufacturers and scour the markets of the world for that which is off color. This is a wild and sweeping assertion against the moral tastes of Cleveland's citizens and its exhibitors in particular which we expect they will not let pass unanswered. As for ourselves this very inhumane diatribe by a very humane society stamps their sudden outburst of virtue as being hypercritical, if not hypocritical.

Still they seem to have taken one very sensible step in their crusade and that is to arrange for a joint meeting of their committee with the film exchange men of Cleveland and the exhibitors for the purpose of regulating the films to be used in the future.

What the result of this conference was we expect to give in our next week's number, meanwhile we quote a very noncommital if not palliative interview given to the Cleveland "News" by Mrs. W. E. Linden, president of the Cleveland Congress of Mothers' Clubs, a body which is working along with the Humane Society. Mrs. Linden says:

> "It is to be lamented that the taste of many runs to this form of entertainment. The managers naturally want to offer what will prove the most profitable. If the people would demand clean entertainments with all vulgarity eliminated the managers would meet the demand.
> "There is nothing more instructive or entertaining than moving picture exhibits of the right sort," continued Mrs. Linden. "We object to pictures of crime and those that are violent, vulgar or suggestive. I have visited a number of theaters lately and have found some objectionable pictures, but also some that were highly entertaining and others that were highly educational. One pictured the cocoa industry and another the passage of wheat from the field to the flour bin.
> "I do not believe that objectionable pictures incite children to crime as do nickel novels, at least not to the same degree. I have seen children turn away from pictures of brutality and violence. We want those pictures eliminated before the children become hardened to them."

It is due Mrs. Linden to explain that the opening sentence of her remarks, as quoted, is not a lament against the popularity of the moving picture entertainment as a whole, but was a rejoinder to the assertion of her interviewer that the public seemed to demand sensational films. To an extent this is true. There is an element in every community who hanker after the most sensational forms of amusement and if they do not find it in the moving picture shows, tempered with what is also elevating and educational, they will seek and find it in places where these palliative forces do not exist.

But to go back to the assertions made by the agent of the Humane Society: We have carefully scanned the manufacturers' list of realeases for the past two months, most of which we have seen upon the screen, and we cannot recall any film that is open to such scathing attack from a moral point of view. Then the fact must not be overlooked that these films have been examined and passed upon by a National Board of Censorship, composed of men and women who are fully as well qualified to censor public morals as any other public body. The manufacturers are also endeavoring, as far as possible, to eliminate the sensational and if they accede to the demands of the exhibitors for more excitement in the programme it but bears out the lament of Mrs. Linden that "the taste of many runs to this form of entertainment."

EDUCATIONAL FILMS ARE APPRECIATED.

We have been at considerable pains, of late, to feel the public pulse on this question by watching the effect upon audiences of what are known as educational or industrial films. We are free to confess that they do not get the rounds of applause that greet a cowboy hero or the happy ending of some tense melodrama, but it must not be forgotten by exhibitors that the element that applauds any kind of a show is the most demonstrative, and the larger and more refined portion of their audience who may receive an educational film in stony silence are no less appreciative because they control their feelings.

Further than to say that such are in demand by a portion of the populace, we have not attempted to defend the sensational film. On the contrary, we deprecate its existence, and THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD welcomes the efforts of those manufacturers who are giving us more and more of the educational and the classic. But the exhibitors, who stand between them and the public and have invested their money in legitimate enterprises, are not open to censure for catering to public demand It seems to us that the efforts of those reformers and crusaders are misdirected who would turn every place of amusement into a kindergarten or Sunday school. No, we are not correct in saying that their work is misdirected, but it is out of its sphere. It should be directed to other channels—nearer the source of the stream of life instead of stirring up the mud in the river bed.

Honi Soit Qui Mal y Pense.

"Evil to him who evil thinks." The spectator of a play or a painting or other work of art, or the reader of a book, only gets out of it what he brings to it—in other words, it acts as the mirror of his soul. What would become of the Bible, Shakespeare's works, and our greatest operas if they were pruned of all reference to that which appeals to the morbid mind? Yet who but a degenerate sees only the vile in art as well as in life?

A writer in a theatrical paper has lately taken up considerable editorial space to inflict upon his readers his views of certain moving picture dramas—especially mentioning the productions of a noted French firm. No doubt "there's a reason," as Brother Hoff so tersely puts it in his able defense, which fittingly stigmatizes the utterances as "blackmail" and therefore "despised and discredited" But that the stuff should have appeared in the pages of a journal which claims recognition as "the world's greatest amusement newspaper" is only another evidence of the inconsistency which has marked its career. On its editorial page, less than six months ago we find the following declaration of policy:

> "We have always endeavored to take the broad view that an evil once exposed is half remedied."

This was said in defence of a morbid film which the National Board of Censorship had condemned in toto. and, in taking issue with the finding of the Board of Censorship, the editor said: "We go on record in the belief that they have not taken quite as broad a view of the subject as would have been expected of them." Now, to carry out the policy of our contemporary, as outlined above, the evils of drunkenness and infidelity which are exposed in the films to which they now take such violent exception, would have a remedial effect. But instead these scenes, which are mere incidents in the working out of powerful dramas, are singled out by this new moral censor as the features which most stirred his mind, which is indeed deplorable.

He goes on to say that this will be followed by "articles by well-known medical authorities on the prenatal influence of moving pictures, followed by opinions by lawyers of national reputation on the legal liabilities of film manufacturers where such pictures cause children to be born into the world deformed or feeble-minded."

To quote "Spectator" in our contemporary, The Dramatic Mirror, "This is, indeed, 'uplift' run mad." Further comment is superfluous. Only we are left wondering what prenatal influence, some thirty-odd years ago, could have affected the mind that wrote this drivel, seeing that moving pictures were not then invented?

Clergymen Patronize Moving Picture Exhibitions.

If a reply was needed to the carping critic, the zealous crusader or the disgruntled individual who, for one reason or another, spits venom against the moving picture show we may be pardoned for again quoting from an article which appeared recently in a New England newspaper over the signature of the Rev. H. E. Latham. The attitude of the clergy toward moving picture shows has hitherto been one of tolerance. In certain sections there has been, and there still is, war waged against the Sunday show, and if this agitation has not been instigated by the clergy, they have generally been brought into it. We dealt with the Sunday question two weeks ago, and on that subject will only add that if the laws of a community prohibit Sunday shows, the exhibitor should abide by the law. If the law is contrary to the wishes of a majority of the adult members of any community, it should be repealed. We learn that many clergymen favor the Sunday show so long as it does not conflict with the hours of their services. We learn that others who do not sanction the Sunday show give it not only their approval but their attendance on other days of the week. As we write this, there lies on our desk a letter from Mr. Bennet A Pryor, an exhibitor of Colusa, Cal., calling attention to his advertisement in the local paper and saying that he has solved the problem of the Sunday question. His program reads: Films, "The Game," "Romance of the Andes," "The Bogus Heir." Songs, "When the Bees Are In the Hive," "Games of Childhood Days." Admission, 10 cents. Prominent in the advertisement is the line, "No Show Sunday." As a consequence he says: "I have every pastor in town and the best element of the population attending my exhibitions. Try it, ye managers; it will work out all right." It may in provincial towns, and we know that it does in many cases, but how about the large cities?

But this is wandering from the subject in hand, and that was our intention to hand out to the adverse critics of the moving picture show the personal opinion of a minister of the Gospel, and here is what the Rev. H. E Latham says:

> "One of the most popular forms of entertainment of this twentieth century is the moving picture theater. As to the character of this form of entertainment, much can be written in its favor and a great deal in its praise.
> "Aside from the low price asked for admission to these theaters, which is a great advantage to the masses that must be entertained, and the length of amusement, which is at the least more than an hour, there are the items of the sense of the beautiful, the dramatic, knowledge and travel.
> "Any person who is at all familiar with the beauty of the picture shown, especially those produced by the best American and French manufacturers of films, realizes that their esthetic or artistic appeal to the average person must be for his good. So far as the dramatic is concerned, it is a well-known fact that only the best actors and pantomimists can be or are employed to act the parts and characters on account of the limitations imposed by having to eliminate the voices and personalities of the actors. A person needs only to recall a few of the plays presented within a month at the most of the moving picture theaters, and the names of the authors and actors, to understand how much good is being done along these lines to instruct and amuse the patrons.
> "We all know that to increase a person's knowledge, and to widen his view of life, is to make him, as a rule, a better neighbor and citizen. When, then, we consider the number of educational films that are shown every day to persons who before never had the opportunity or inclination to learn and know about certain books, stories, historical events, industries and the life of the various nationalities and classes of persons, and in an entertaining and interesting way, we begin to understand why these theaters are so well appreciated and patronized, and how much, too, they are doing along educational lines.
> "The writer has enjoyed several conversations with different librarians of our public libraries in relation to these theaters, and all have said the demand for certain books, stories and histories had increased whenever any of these educational films had been shown at the various moving picture theaters.
> "Along with knowledge and education, of course, travel forms a factor. How often we hear the remark, "Travel is a good educator." For those who cannot afford the time or the means to visit all parts of our country, and foreign lands, what better way is there to see and know our country than by the payment of a few dimes, and the expenditure of what otherwise might be wasted hours, in one of these comfortable moving picture theaters, and go, with no tourists' or travel troubles, to the various enchanted scenes of our world beautiful?
> "I am well within the bounds of truth when I make the statement, that no institution has done so much to popularize and make familiar the scenes and history, not only of our own country, but of all the foreign lands.
> "The writer knows well that there are some high-stepping critics who criticise the morals and suggestions of some of the story and dramatic films. But the fact is, the worst violaters in relation to morality and suggestiveness, and the morbid and sensual, are not our modern stories and plays, but many of our much-vaunted and highly respected classics. Many of the highly honored ancient plays and classics have to be expurgated and revised before the film makers consent to place them before the public. It would be well for some of these captious critics to call to mind these facts, and to remember that even some of the Bible stories of the Old Testament, have to be expurgated and revised before the maker of films offers them for the moral and religious instruction of their patrons.
> "The moving picture theater is here as an institution; as a progressive and improving form of entertainment; for it furnishes amusement cheaply; it instructs; it helps people to enlarge the view of life and things, and gives a higher and better form of pleasure to most of its patrons who would naturally be content with a lower. Any institution that does that ought to be popular and appreciated. Meanwhile it is vastly improving its pictures both in form and matter, and like everything else in this good world only the best will be allowed to survive."

Permanence and Stability.

By Wilford Hill. Talk No. 1.

Possibly Shakespeare never repeats, but the Moving Picture World has said many times already, and believes it is worth repeating many more times, that everything that is being done by manufacturers, exchanges, exhibitors, the press and everyone connected with the moving picture industry to elevate the tone of moving picture films and shows, is doing just so much that makes for permanent stability in the business. It naturally follows that those who thoughtlessly or otherwise are working toward a lower level are just as surely undermining the foundations of permanence and stability for the moving picture form of amusement. This must be so self-evident to most readers of this paper that many of them will feel that it need not take up any space in this or any other publication. Our desire, however, is to see it impressed on the minds not only of the majority, but of every one in any way connected with moving picture production and exhibition. We would like to show that this is the only sane policy, whether we look at the question simply from the standpoint of dollars and cents (as the rewards of labor in providing just so much entertainment for cash) or whether we take a little higher outlook and believe that our work may not only provide relaxation and amusement, but may also be a powerful and effective means of education; just as the stage has been for many centuries in spite of many drawbacks.

In this article we will confine our observations to the theaters or places of exhibition, whether known as arcades, palaces, or any other designation, and we speak of them first because we believe this is a more important point than may appear at first glance. It is true that many of the newer houses all over the country are models in most respects and the Moving Picture World has lately shown many attractive-looking fronts and some clean and inviting-looking interiors. We cannot but feel, however, that the moving picture business would receive its biggest "boost" if all the so-called "palaces" could be made simply clean enough inside and out to appear enticing to the self-respecting majority; if the management of each of them could only see that it would be so much better to discard the present cheap, gaudy, catch-penny devices of one kind and another; if the commonly accepted idea of a Luna Park ticket booth in front, with an occupant who many times certainly adds no dignity to the show, could give place to quiet, orderly attendants, then it would, it seems to us, be unnecessary to have a burly "bouncer" around the door, and people would attend a moving picture theater without feeling that they were slipping into a place where they would not like to have their friends see them.

Of course, we are very far from saying that this is anything like the average of our moving picture theaters, but we all know that this is a fair picture of not a few of them at the present time, and is it not true that a majority of the public get their ideas of all moving picture theaters from passing just those where many of the repugnant and repelling features noted above are forced upon their attention? Take any town with say ten moving picture theaters, nine of which might be conducted in every way so that any father or mother in the town would feel perfectly safe in bringing their children to them every week. Let the one other house be conducted so that disquieting rumors began to be whispered about it, or possibly some article got into the local press about the advisability of attending it, and is there any one of the readers of this article that will deny that to a certain extent all the other nine well conducted houses and the moving picture business in general will suffer? This is true to such an extent that possibly the time may not be far distant when there may be some organization perfected among moving picture exhibitors in every city to purge their ranks of undesirable members in the profession, and for mutual benefit in popularizing moving picture theaters and shows as a form of amusement and relaxation that old and young may enjoy without question at all times. When that feeling can be got in the public mind and fixed there we will have taken a long step towards that permanence and stability in the moving picture business that we believe it will ultimately attain.

Relation of Condensers and Projection Lenses.

By F. H. Richardson.

At last I have discovered what I have long sought, viz., the relation the focal length of the condenser bears to the focal length of the projection lens. There are two ways of measuring a lens, one of which gives the "back focus" and the other the "equivalent focus." The rough and ready method of determining the back focus of a projection lens is to pin a white piece of paper on a wall opposite a window; then hold the lens away from the paper until you project a clear, sharp picture of the window on the paper. Measure from the back of the lens to the paper and that is the "back focus" of the lens. Have the front end of the lens toward the light. To get the equivalent focus proceed exactly the same, but measure from the wall to a point midway between the lenses at either end of the lens. The result is the equivalent focus. To get the equivalent focus of a condensing lens place the two lenses in a holder half way between the two lenses. The equivalent focal length of projection and condensing lens should be practically the same. If you are using a projection lens of six-inch equivalent focus the condensing lens should measure the same, or nearly so. Mind you, to get the equivalent focus of the condenser for this purpose both condenser lenses must be measured together. Of course it will be utterly impossible to fit a condenser to both projection and stereo lens, as the stereo lens will invariably be of much longer focus. You should therefore use a somewhat longer focal length condenser than the M. P. projector calls for, but not too much. The M. P. projector is the main thing in a moving picture show, of course, the stereo being merely a side issue by comparison. There is considerable leeway in applying this rule, though the nearer your condensers fit your projection lens the better will be the result. By combining two condenser lenses of different focal length, such as, for instance, one 6½ and one 7½, one will be able to come near enough to fitting any focal length projection lens.

I have sought long for this very simple rule, but without result until last week, when I finally secured it from what appears to be unquestioned authority. I accept it as correct by reason of the source from when it came to me and the more readily for the reason that it appeals to common sense as being correct. As soon as practical I shall give you a table of equivalent focal lengths of different combinations of condenser lenses, but first I must prepare the table by actual experiments.

The Worrell Manufacturing Company of Sedalia, Mo., have moved their main office and factory to 212 Main street, St. Louis, Mo., where they expect to do an increased business. Everything will be in running order by the first of March. Their Pino Spray disinfectant and dust remover is an excellent article which every moving picture show house can use to advantage.

EDUCATION BY KINEMATOGRAPH: FUTURE PROSPECTS.

By Thomas. Clegg.

[From the "Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly."]

Twelve months ago every mishap at a motion picture display was announced by bold headlines in every newspaper. No matter to what cause the accident of the moment was due—whether to faulty building construction in halls used daily for a hundred and one purposes, to panic arising from fear on the part of a half-witted member of the audience, to the alarm of fire raised through the explosion of an oil lamp used for the illumination of a theater during a variety "turn" preceding the picture display—all accidents, of whatever nature, were placed to the discredit of the motion picture and the appliances used in its projection, even when the only evidence lay in the fact that a preliminary poster announcing a forthcoming exhibition was affixed outside the building. County councils framed by-laws intended as safeguards, legislation gave serious consideration to the subject, and the Kinematograph Bill is the latest result of parliamentary action.

Meantime, manufacturers and inventors were not idle. The life of an industry which affords employment to tens of thousands of people, in which millions of pounds are invested, and which furnishes amusement and edification for millions of people in every country of the world—too important to be placed at the mercy of scaremongers and more or less ignorant or biased agitators—was threatened, and while the industry was never for a moment in jeopardy, the fact was recognized that every panic, every accident, from whatever cause arising, put back for the time being the clock of kinematographic progress.

Particularly do these remarks apply to the motion picture in science and education. The utility, the necessity, of this form of instruction is becoming more apparent every day. Heads of colleges and public schools, professors and science masters, school managers and schoolmasters, are loud in praise of the theory of educating through the eye as well as through the ear; but what of the practice?

"I have been for thirty years a schoolmaster," said one eminent head of a college to the writer, "and I fail to see any reason for change."

His argument was proof of the need. Thirty years in one groove! No thought of improvement, except in the way of nearly obsolete lantern slides. He had seen motion pictures, taken his boys to see them, admired them, gained instruction both for himself and his pupils from the display; but—

"No. I do not see my way at present," he remarked, "to introduce the system into my school. Think of the danger, my dear sir, of fused wires and fired films! Think of increased insurance premiums; of parental objections to the innovation!"

But while schoolmasters were content with existing systems, while statesmen were legislating, while county councils were considering and passing by-laws, the real heads of the motion picture business, who foresaw endless possibilities enwrapped in the reels of film, were planning, experimenting, and demonstrating schemes and apparatus calculated to nullify all the measures of precaution deemed necessary for safeguarding the public. And what are the results so far? What the possibilities—nay, the certainties—for the future?

1.—"Non-Flam" Film; already introduced, and gaining favor with exhibitors every day. Further than this, many exhibitors are working with the "non-flam" and are ignorant of the fact. They take—they are obliged to take—the usual precautions, but if a breakage of film or a momentary stoppage through fusing occurs, no one is more surprised than the operator of the machine at the "non-flam" result. No flare, no scare: simply a break in the film, or a pause in the performance which a minute or so will make good, and no member of the audience is any the wiser, or any the worse. This is demonstrated by the Lumiere film, and while every American manufacturer is at present using the Eastman "non-flam" stock, a full working supply is promised for Europe at an early date. The relative values of the two are no concern of the writer's; he has witnessed tests which were, to his mind, perfectly satisfactory.

2.—Prevention of Fire. A most effectual device is provided by the construction of the rising and falling gate into what is practically a fireproof box. This prevents the spread of fire above or below the exposure hole, so that only one picture of the size of a postage stamp can possibly be destroyed, and even then the perforations remain intact.

In the event of this device failing from any—practically impossible—cause, fireproof spool boxes are now supplied by every manufacturer which, at a comparatively small additional cost, conform to the County Council requirements.

By the use of these devices, which the writer has also seen tested thoroughly in every way, no possible chance of accident can occur. About two feet of film, at the most, could fire, and the matter would be one of seconds only before the performance could be resumed.

3.—Daylight Screens, which do away with the objections freely expressed in many quarters to the evils supposed to exist by display of motion pictures in a darkened hall or room.

There are several systems of daylight kinematography, either on the market or shortly to be introduced, of which the writer has seen two:

(a) Perfectly satisfactory, given under conditions of subdued light, by which the pictures equalled in brilliancy those thrown upon the ordinary linen sheet in a darkened hall. For this device it is claimed that pictures, whether plain, tinted or colored, can be exhibited with 100 per cent. more brilliant effect.

(b) The writer was the only spectator at an exhibition of daylight kinematography by another system, given in a small London garden under circumstances of general unreadiness at a surprise visit. This scheme, which had its faults, correction of which was speedily promised, is intended for open-air displays, and with 22 amperes, on a voltage of 160, the pictures projected in three lights—bright sunshine, gloom preceding a thunderstorm, and the actual storm itself, when rain deluged the surroundings—were marvellous in their definition and detail when viewed directly from the front, but the fault lay in the fore-shortening of the image when seen from any angle.

The futility of a Kinematograph Bill to safeguard the public against what are now non-existent dangers will therefore at once be apparent, as will also the objections of school managers and science masters to the introduction of the kinematograph for educational purposes into the establishments under their control.

Of the pictures themselves, little need be said. Subjects galore are in readiness for dealing thoroughly and exhaustively with the majority of educational and scientific requirements. Apparatus for their safe display is ready; "non-flam" film is ready, and exhibitions may now be safely given in every school and class room, either during daylight or in a hall fully or partially lit by artificial means. The expense is not so ruinous as many school managers think, and even this could be greatly reduced, if not entirely met, by giving on stated occasions social displays not on strictly educational lines, for which a charge for admission could be made, and by the adoption of the co-operative or lending library systems for the acquisition of suitable film subjects.

With regard to the value of teaching by means of motion pictures, there can only be one opinion. For geographical instruction the kinematograph now sends its lines into all the earth. The eye of the camera makes pictures from Brazil to the Yukon, from China to the Cape, from the Cape to Cairo. It has become the teacher of the public mind, the organ of public opinion, the university of the common people. Holding the mirror up to life, it reflects the facts of life with definiteness of outline and truth of proportion, all sorts of facts being depicted, because all sorts of facts are there.

In medical, surgical and natural science, anthropology, botany, entomology, and natural history generally, the motion picture presents wonders and facts scarcely possible of realization, while its illustrations of industrial life, technical processes and mechanical devices are unique in their thoroughness and definition.

Colonial governments have long recognized its usefulness in bringing to the very doors of the people at home, the importance, value and beauty of British dependencies, not only as a means of inducing emigration, but of securing the introduction of fresh capital for further development; and it is fairly common knowledge that there is constant movement in the direction of securing fresh pictorial demonstrations of future possibilities for emigrant and investor in such countries as Australia, Canada, British Columbia, Argentine, etc.

In religious, missionary, social and political work the field opened up by the kinematograph is equally great and equally important, both on account of the source of revenue provided, and the conviction of usefulness and further effort instilled, which no lecturer, preacher or deputation could ever attain with the lantern slide.

For commercial advertising and public enlightenment, the motion picture is far superior to any other means, and the benefit to manufacturing concerns has proved itself to be immense, out of all proportion to the cost, illustrating the scientific, industrial, and commercial changes that mark the present age.

In state affairs—naval and military—its general adoption is only a question of time. Various governments have already organized departments to deal with matters bioscopic, as they affect the numerous branches of the services—gunnery, target practice, fleet movements, maneuvers, etc.—and before very long it may safely be predicted that every regiment and every warship will possess an efficient kinematograph outfit for the acquisition and instructive display of pictures, intended to form a systematic course of education in training establishments afloat and ashore, which will prove fresh, vigorous and stimulating.

PUTTING THE OTHER FELLOW OUT OF BUSINESS.

By H. F. Hoffman.

There is one kind of nasty type among moving picture men everywhere, and he hasn't been written about half enough. He is the man who is always going to "put the other fellow out of business."

It makes no difference to him whether or not his own house is doing a land office business, and he is getting rich quick; that other fellow is always a thorn in his side. By some mental process he has worked it out that any other exhibitor in that particular neighborhood is simply infringing on the moving picture rights that were reserved for him by the superior wisdom of Providence.

This particular type of moving picture man is seldom an old-timer. He is usually a newcomer. He has kept close tabs on the pioneer exhibitor before his own establishment came into being. He has visited many times, unbeknown, the pioneer's bungalow and found much to criticise in the accommodations and in the way things were done. He has said to himself: "If this man only knew who I am, and what I am going to do, he would get down on his knees and beg for mercy." There are so many things that are going to be better about his place that he gives the other fellow about two months to last.

While the workmen are fitting up his new place, this man of genius stands around smoking long black cigars. He looks prosperous and wise, more so than he will again for some time. Occasionally he will study the blue prints and have a private consultation with the contractor, with their backs turned toward us who are peering in at the wide open front. They do a lot of pointing here and there and we long to know what new innovation this means.

A telegram is handed to the magnate; he tilts his hat back and his cigar up and jingles some coins in his pocket while he absorbs this new and urgent secret. He passes out without a glance at us and we follow him along the street. He passes the pioneer's bungalow with a furtive glance that changes to a grim smile when he is past. We thought he was going in and are disappointed when we see him enter a barber shop.

He has met the barber before; in fact, the barber has given him a few pointers worth knowing concerning who's who and what's what in the neighborhood. During the shave the barber admits that the other picture houses in the neighborhood are all pretty punk, and ventures to prophesy that the first man who comes along and gives the people "the goods" will "put the other fellows out of business."

This talk pleases the new impresario; he imagines the barber doesn't know who he is. Before the shave is over, Mr. Barber is taken into confidence and informed who he is talking with. Moreover, he is tipped off quietly that the long expected is soon to happen, and it will be moving day for somebody when the "Grand Opening" takes place.

Nothing but unconditional surrender are his terms. That night he visits his victim's place. He sees the crowd and he bites his lip at the sight of the money that is slipping through his fingers. Money that is his by the divine wish of the God of Things as They Ought to Be. His by the power of second-sight what the pioneer saw at first.

He is thinking more about putting that other fellow out of business than he is about the money he is going to make himself. He doesn't want him to have a look-in. Not even a smell. Off the earth for his.

Mr. Pioneer has heard something. The agent who let the premises for the new affair told him that the newcomer let it be understood that his shebang was to be no cheap affair like the others, but one that would knock the spots off anything around, and only a question of time when he would put the others out of business.

The pioneer was a wise manager. Twice before strange capital had come with blowing of trumpets. Each made no secret of the fact that they were going to run him out of business. The pioneer saw them both go down and out and still remained. He had lived long enough to learn that the man who comes in crowing about putting another out of business is generally the first to go.

Sometimes a new exhibitor does run an old one out, but why the grudge against him? He was there first, and yet our type of newcomer begrudges him his very bread and butter; the poor fellow is encroaching on divine rights. If this kind of newcomer is doing well he is not satisfied, because the old exhibitor still exists. He fills his program fuller than ever; his ambition now is not to see how much money he can make for himself, but simply to "put the other fellow out of business."

JERSEY SHOWMEN WIN SUNDAY CASE.

A victory was won by the moving picture showmen in the Supreme Court at Trenton on February 15, when the conviction of Martin Singer for giving a Sunday performance there five months ago without a license from the city, was set aside. Singer was sentenced by Judge Hahn, in the First Precinct Court, to pay a fine of $50 and costs. It was made a test case, and Chandler W. Riker, counsel for the defendant, appealed to the Supreme Court.

It was the contention of Mr. Riker that the city could not legally grant a license for a Sunday performance in violation of State law, and that, therefore, it was not right to fine a man for not obtaining a thing which he could not lawfully obtain. In this contention Mr. Riker was upheld by Justice Parker, who rendered the opinion.

Frederick Young, president of the Exhibitors' Association, said that in his judgment the court had decreed that the offenses of both theaters and motion picture shows, so far as Sunday exhibitions go, are the same. He asserted he construed this as giving him and his associates the same rights as the theaters until the Jacobs case is adjudicated, and he expressed the belief the police would look at it in the same light and make no interference.

Mr. Young added that the organization would hold a meeting at Singer's Hall, 5 South Orange avenue, Thursday night. This would not be for the purpose, however, of determining whether or not to open Sunday, as that was decided upon informally last night, but to reach some understanding as to the nature of the performances which would be given on the Sabbath. For instance, he said, there was no doubt the members would agree to keep out all children on Sundays and would exhibit only that class of pictures which he characterized as educational or sacred.

MARTIN SINGER.

To Martin Singer, of Newark, N. J., must be given the credit for having taken the initiative in testing the legality of the arrests of managers who gave Sunday shows. He was well supported by his brother exhibitors who organized an association for mutual protection. Until the Jacobs case is decided the nickel show is on the same plane as the large theater as far as the legality of Sunday performances is concerned, and it is the opinion of not a few that if exhibitors are careful as to the selection of their Sunday programs that they will not be molested.

PRECEDENT.

By F. H. Richardson.

There are many showmen and many operators who would succeed better were they not bound hard and fast to precedent. They feel that they must do a thing thus and so because everyone else does it that way. Copying a good example is all well and good, but one should never lack the courage of his convictions to blaze a new trail. Eternal copying after the methods of others evidences lack of initiative and that is likely to mean lack of brains. Many managers and many operators conceive excellent ideas entirely original with themselves, but fear to put them into practice because they fear to break down the barriers of precedent. Conditions are continually changing and it is up to you, my boy, to meet them. You should have the brains to originate and the courage to work out your ideas in practice, even though they be absolutely new and untried. Edison, Fulton, Columbus and hundreds of other pioneers of progress won fame and advanced the world in knowledge because they refused to follow precedent, branching out instead in new and untrod paths which led to fame and often to fortune. Men told Fulton the steamboat was impossible. Men said Columbus was a lunatic. Men stigmatized many, most, in fact, of our pioneers of progress who refused to be led about by the nose by precedent, as hair-brained lunatics. Time proved they were the benefactors of human kind instead. Have ideas of your own. Originate new things to meet new conditions and, above all things, have the courage of your convictions.

SOME MORE ERRORS OF THE PRODUCER.

By a Canadian Exhibitor.

I was much interested in your recent article on "Historical Errors," principally because what hurts the show business most in Canada is the incorrectness so often appearing in And when such topnotchers as the Selig people put out a American films of any subject dealing with British events. film called "The Highlanders' Defiance," one would think they would pay some attention to facts, considering that their films are shown in every house in Canada. Not only that, but surely every Scot (and they are found everywhere) must leave the show with a feeling of resentment after seeing it. Just a few errors in this film:

First—The Highlanders were not in the action at Spion Kop at all.

Second—Uniform is incorrect in every particular. U. S. Army gaiters don't make spats. White canvas strips don't make crossbelts. (Where were the cartridge bags?) The English uniform does not comprise bandoliers. Only the Canadian and Colonial troops wore those for the first two years.

Third—Who ever saw an infantry regiment armed with carbines?

Then, also, troops were not conveyed to Africa in warships. To the people here, where we have Highland militia regiments, and where so many have been to Africa, the whole reel simply creates a feeling of disgust at American ignorance. If they want to put on a Boer War reel, why not get some of us who were through it to give them pointers? I would offer my services gratis, with pleasure, because such a reel would be an immense drawing card in Canada.

Not long ago the Kalem people put out a reel, called "The Cattle Thieves," and advertised it as taken from the original "Northwestern Royal Mounted Police," which it evidently was not (they do say it was acted near Hamilton, Ont.), for when it was shown in Regina, the headquarters of the "Royal Northwest Mounted Police," the pride of Western Canada, the show was practically put on the rough, so I am told.

Give us good Canadian and British subjects, by all means, but only pay the same attention to detail as with American war pictures.

PITTSBURG, KAN., THEATERS KEEP PATRONS WAITING.

A late Frisco train, one day last week, caused late matinees for the nickel shows in the city. They had been expecting their new reels all day as fast as the trains came in from Kansas City, from which they are furnished. An hour before the opening of the afternoon matinees at both the Crystal and Electric, crowds had assembled and waited for the doors to open, and the patrons waited and waited on the assurance that the programs would be on time. They arrived later and in less than fifteen minutes after the music had started and the pictures were going over the machine. The Mystic, which is served by the Western Film Exchange, was the only show to open on time.

SUNDAY LAWS IN HARTFORD.

The people who started a crusade against the opening of the moving picture shows in Hartford, Conn., on Sunday seem to have stirred up a bigger hornet's nest of trouble than they bargained for. The Hartford "Times" is authority for the statement that no small portion of the community are in favor of enforcing the law to the letter, and this would mean the closing of drug stores, confectionery and cigar stores and other places which now enjoy freedom. The law reads:

"Every person who shall do any secular business or labor, except works of necessity or mercy, or keep open any shop, warehouse, or any manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or expose any property for sale, or engage in any sport between 12 o'clock Saturday night and 12 o'clock Sunday night, shall be fined not more than $50."

"That," says the editor of the "Times," "seems to be plain, but it has been differently construed. In fact, a law that is or can be made to seem double-faced is a danger and a disgrace to the State that maintains it on the books. But the action and the lack of action of the last few weeks are as anomalous as the law itself."

A reader of the Hartford "Times" who is in sympathy with the indiscriminate opening of the shows presents some very strong arguments in favor thereof. What applies to the "newsie" also applies to other members of the community. Other members of the community may be supposed to entertain ideas similar to those expressed by the "newsie" in the following verses:

THE NEWSIE'S POINT OF VIEW.

Buy a paper, mister, a Journal, Times or Post?
Gee! dis wedder's frosty; its down to zero, most.
Let's call it off now, Skinny, we've sold out all our Times;
We'll beat it to a pitchure show—I got two extra dimes
For helpin' of a boozy guy to get home wid his load—
I owes yer for a treat last week; I tink it's time I blowed.

I likes de movin' pitchures—yep—I tinks dere outer sight;
I used to go to see dem wid me goil on Sunday night.
Now don't yer kid me, Skinny, jest fer callin' her "me goil"—
It's Mag, what peddled papers down on Main street, corner Pearl.
Her old man was a rummy, an' her mudder, she scrubbed floors
An' took in family washins—she jest kept de wolf out-doors.

De woiken folks, like Mag an' me, don't have much fun.
Of all de evenin's in de week deres only one
When we can jest enjoy ourselves—jest Sunday night
A-taken in a pitchure show—now honor bright—
Do you tink dat dose preacher-guys is realy, realy, sure
Dat dey'r pleasin' de good Gawd by botherin' de poor?

Me an' Maggie an' her ma (we sometimes took her, too,
To be what dey calls "shaper-own," jest like de rich guys do.)
We'd set up in de galry dere, upon a Sunday night,
An' sometimes Mag's old man would come, when he was feelin' right,
Which made Mag's ma so cheery—why, it made de old dame feel
Jest as happy as a hobo dreamin' of a good square meal.

An 'wunst we seed a movin' pitchure of a guy what boozed
An' den comed home and 'bused his wife, jest like Mag's old man used.
De old man don't say nuttin', but I sees him bite his lip
An' feel back at de pint of gin he carries on his hip.
An' when we gets out on de street, by jinks! I hears a clink,
An' splash down in de gutter where he'd gone an' chucked de drink.

Right dere he took an' climbed up on de water-wagon seat
An' ever since Mag an' her Ma has clothes an' lots t' eat.
De old man's got a steady job, he works now ev'ry day,
An' it would do your heart good just for once to hear him say—
"I never knewed jest what a bum I gone an' got to be Until dose movin' pitchures went an' showed meself to me."

Now Sunday nights dey goes an' closes ev'ry pitchure show,
An' dey don't give us woiken folks no other place to go—
That is, exceptin' to a church, which ain't no kind of fun;
Ask me—I sure knows about dat—for wunst I went to one.
De big woids what de preacher said, dey don't get in me ear,
He might as well talked Polack as de woids what I could hear.

But what I sees wit me own eyes I knows an' understans.
When I sees movin' pictures of de far-off furrin lan's,
Where de Hunks an' Ginnies comes from—yer kin betcher life I knows
Dat of all de lan's an' countrys; 'taint no matter where you goes—
Dis here country's got dem beaten—take me oat dat ain't no kid—
'Cause we learned it from de movin' pitchures—me an' Maggie did.

Now on de level, Skinny, dose yer tink deres any wrong
In a Sunday movin' pitcmre, or a illustrated song
'Bout de sweetheart dat is waitin' neat de maples on de hill—
(Which we all joins in de chorus an' we sings it wit a will)—
Why, dose guys, dey must be nutty, for to tink dat it's a sin
To be in de nice teaters, steader hallways, drinkin' gin.

Mag's old man says dat de preachers an' de party dat is in
Are a-blamin' of each other an a-cussin' like old sin,
'Cause deres been a mistake somewheres an' tings ain't gone jest de way
Dat dey framed it up an' fixed it, an' dat next election day
De people dat dey tink dey've fooled will set dese tings to rights
So us kids kin see dose movin' pitchures wunst again on Sunday nights.

While strolling through the uptown streets of the metropolis the other night my mind drifted into comparisons. I thought of the moving picture business as it was six or seven years ago and as it is to-day. I well remember in the early stages the pictures were looked upon by most people as a joke. Vaudeville performers made meat of the pictures for their jokes; when managers were asked why they carried the pictures on their programs they jokingly replied that they could get them cheaper than another kind of closing act and they served as a notice to the audience that the show was over and thus saved jams at the exits, the audiences gradually thinning out after the flashing of the announcement slide for the pictures. At that time, it will be remembered, the vaudeville houses were using but one reel of film a week "just to close the show," as the saying went. Some people used to call it "the chaser," which was another joke floated by the vaudeville performer, who had a grudge against the pictures because they were taking up time and space on the programs that could be very conveniently filled by themselves. I was connected with a vaudeville house at the time and well I know how the performers looked upon the pictures. Even the innocent operators were at times ostracized from the professional circles. And in spite of all, the picture people were quite willing to be called and treated as jokes. Why? Because for that one reel, a machine and an operator they were getting more money than they have received since the business assumed aggressive proportions. Houses were then paying $75.00 a week for what I have enumerated. No change of reels from Monday to Sunday. The one reel, one machine and one man. Gradually the prices dropped to $60.00, then to $50.00, then $40.00, and for quite a while they held out at $35.00. About that time the store shows, or nickelodeons, started and the vaudevillians concocted jokes about the bargain-counter rushes at the store shows. No one would permit his mind to entertain for a moment any thought other than that the pictures were on the toboggan and would soon drift into oblivion. Had anybody suggested, no matter what his reputation for astuteness as a theatrical manager may have been, that houses along the Great White Way, or any other recognized theatrical center, be turned into a moving picture house, his friends would have urged his committal to a sanitarium. And yet while strolling along Broadway the other night I saw an immense electric sign in front of the New York Theater, announcing "Moving Pictures." I stopped for a moment to ask if they paid, and was curtly told that the management knew enough to drop anything that did not pay. And there is the old Fourteenth Street Theater, the home of French opera in years gone by the house that was packed night after night when Mlle. Aimee was in her prime, where the lamented Stuart Robson and the cherished Binnie Palmer interpreted "Black-Eyed Susan," where, O, ever so many other leaders in their profession held the public eye; and now the once despised moving pictures hold sway and make Manager Rosenquest happy. Go further uptown again and see the lines of people waiting for admission to the Lincoln Square, the Circle and the Majestic theaters. Within a stone's throw of Wallack's you will find another group waiting for admission to a Broadway house—to see the pictures.

And to cap the climax, the announcement is made that the famous old playhouse that for years was the home of what was the best in opera and drama, the historic Academy of Music, will become a moving picture house on June 1st. I have not seen the papers upon which control of the house was secured, but I learned from very excellent authority that the annual rental from June 1 will be $100,000 at least. Directly opposite the Academy is the Dewey Theater, which has been a picture house for some time, and a few doors west of it is being erected another immense house that will also be devoted to the pictures. And the three places I have mentioned will be controlled by one man. I mean by that that the ownership of the three will be identical. The pictures are evidently going some, and on this presentation of fact can anyone doubt that they pay?

I hear some exhibitor say, "O, that's all very well. That fellow has plenty of money and picks up everything in sight to shut out competition, on the theory that small returns from many places will make good return on the aggregate invested." This cannot be disputed, but when a man is willing to pay $2,000 a week in rental for one place he must know what is in the game.

I heard an exhibitor say, in commenting on the investments to which I have referred, "I can't see how they do it. I am paying $100 a month for my store and if the landlord should raise it to $125 I would be obliged to flash the 'Good Night' slide for the last time." The place of this exhibitor cannot be cited as a comparison with the gigantic ventures. The classes are distinct. To speak frankly, the exhibitors who pay from $1,200 to say $4,000 in rents are only pikers when we find other exhibitors pay from $35,000 to $100,000. And let me say right here that the big money spenders do not depend alone upon the pictures or the vaudeville acts for returns upon their investment. The house plays a most important part. Let anyone of these magnates take a storeroom, regardless of size, large or small, along the "White Way" and put pictures in it. Can you see the "to let" sign? I can. The vast investments, the gorgeous arrangement and the painstaking management of the modern picture houses have attracted to the pictures the attention of thousands of people who never entered a nickelodeon, and they have become regular patrons of the advanced establishments. I venture the prediction that before the dawn of 1911 there will be in Greater New York no less than fifty advanced picture houses under the management of people prominently identified with the theatrical business, people who two years ago would as soon have backed a Punch and Judy show as a moving picture house. And, mark my words, thousands of people who now claim to be "legitimate" vaudeville performers will be on the boards of the picture houses, playing circuits, as they do now. Many of them are already in line, but the percentage is insignificant to what it will be within the next ten or twelve months.

Unfortunately, moving pictures have not afforded to the vaudeville performer the outlet they have presented to what have always been known as "the legitimate" people. Monologists, singers and dancers are rarely available in the making of pictures. Acrobats and people with novelties and spectacular effects amount to nothing in value to the maker of subjects. There is nothing in those lines that the manufacturers of films cannot duplicate, if they wish to. A tricky manipulation of the camera can accomplish wonders. I have known the best of magicians to offer their services at picture studios and receive a curt but polite refusal. The invariable reply to all such applicants is, "Why should I pay you to do what one of our stage hands can do with a proper manipulation of the camera?" And let it be understood as a positive fact, it has been demonstrated time and again, all such acts fall flat with the audiences when reproduced in moving pictures. No matter how good the acts, or how prominent and popular the performers may be, the audiences will declare that the reproductions are the results of clever camera manipulation and refuse to accept them in the same spirit they receive the original. With the legitimate performers the case is different. The makers of the pictures are constantly reaching out for effect and perfection. Men, women and children who can act are constantly in demand. Amateurs no longer appear in pictures. The legitimate ranks are consantly drawn upon, and quite frequently the stars are induced to play the leading role in some important production. This is especially the case where the subjects to be worked out are of an historical character. If some of the foreign films are watched it will be noticed that in conjunction with the main title of the film, or immediately following it, a cast of characters is given with the names of the impersonators and the theaters with which they are, or have been, connected. Some of the leading legitimate people have been induced to assume roles in moving picture productions in this country, but announcements of this are very rarely made. The performers have not yet reached that state of mind justifying them in allowing the public to know they have "played for the pictures." They have a fear that should it become known they would lose prestige in their regular line. This feeling will in time be dispelled. The picture makers are steadily and persistently laboring to make their productions true to every detail scenically, in costuming and in performance, and in time those who claim to devote their time to the art for the art's sake will find that the pictures afford an excellent field for their ambitions. The pictures of to-day are studied by the audiences and they are quick to detect true genius in certain characters. The makers of the pictures recognize this, and they are on the alert for people who can pass the criticisms of the audiences as well as the directors of the productions. There was a time when the pictures were made for almost the sole purpose of appealing to the eye. Not so now. Puppets need no longer apply for work in pictures. People who can act are wanted, and they must know how to act so that when the pictures are reproduced the audiences will say they can act, because these high rentals are drawing audiences that are critical and want the best.

SCENARIO WRITING FOR MOVING PICTURES.

The writing of scenarios, or manuscripts, for moving pictures has revealed itself to many of our foremost authors and playwrights as a fine art. The newness, but not the popularity of moving pictures, has worn off; they are an establishment for which the demand is greater and the appreciation keener, necessitating a larger, better and more diversified supply.

It is a great accomplishment to produce a good scenario for moving pictures, either drama or comedy, with all its necessary requirements of story, interest, sequence, logic, etc., and its practicability as a working script in the hands of the play director. Out of the two thousand submitted manuscripts received from all parts of the country by the extensive Manuscript Department of the Vitagraph Company of America in four months about 2 per cent. were accepted and only four of these were practical working scenarios; the balance of the 2 per cent. had to be rewritten by their own staff.

The producers of moving pictures will welcome the time when only bright and accomplished writers will contribute to their repertoires. There is a widening and increasing field for such contributions, for which the remuneration is not limited: it is only a question of quality, originality and practicability.

In none of the arts are there so many amateurs and poorly equipped aspirants for distinction than in play writing, persons who are depending upon natural ability, chance or accident to make a hit and be recognized, mere junk producing ink slingers.

Here is an almost incredible sample of a would-be writer. Anyone who could be guilty of the following and think he could get away with it would be a case of cerebral hopelessness:

"Dear Sir—I beg youse to read this story from the start to the finish. I hope if youse will read it youse will like it and if youse don't understand it please send a litter saying I should come so I could explain it to youse and show youse my motions. Hoping to receive your favorbly reply. I am. Yours truly.

"_____"

"Not all the literary curiosities," said the Vitagraph, "are furnished by the illiterate." To illustrate, we quote an idea for a moving picture sent by a college professor:

"A sick man is sent to a hospital. The doctors decide that an operation must be performed. They remove the man's stomach and place it on a table near the window. A dog jumps in the window and runs away with the stomach. The doctors are at a loss to furnish another stomach. They secure a lamb's stomach and sew it in the patient. After the man gets well he insists on getting down on all fours and eating the grass from the lawn, refusing to sit at the table like the rest of the family."

It is incomprehensible that a person who has ever seen a moving picture could conceive that the story would be of any interest or value; it is certain that he has not seen any of the recent productions or else his idea of humor must have been warped with the expansion of his collegiate brain.

As an evidence of what some writers consider an absorbing theme for a play, we reproduce a couple of scenes from the scenario, "The Adventures of an Amateur Photographer":

Scene 4. "The disaster." Hall outside of his room. His mother comes down the hall as though looking for someone and opens the door of his darkened room, spoiling his negatives.

Scene 5. "He forgives." Same room as Scenes 1 and 3. His mother tells him how sorry she is and he forgives her, brightening up as he takes his flash-light pistol. After loading it up, he takes his outfit and starts to go out to take some pictures by flash-light.

Scene 6. "A picture by flash-light." Need not be any place in particular. He arranges camera, fires pistol and when smoke clears away he is lying on the ground. Some passersby recognize him and take him home.

Scene 7. "Never again!" Same room as Scene 1. After being put to bed, he raises his right hand above his head as though to swear: "Never again!"

This goes to show that a great many persons think an incident is a story or a trivial individual experience is a matter of general interest and importance.

This effusion of an active brain, entitled "The Delusive Flea," was submitted as a regular "tickler" and something entirely original:

Scene 1. "Cause and effect." Dog scratching himself and saying: "What's biting me?" Screen showing enlarged picture of flea.

Scene 2. "The encounter." Another dog, different color from Scene 1, approaching first dog. Fight between the two dogs. Second dog whips first dog, who runs into house.

Scene 3. "What's one's loss is another's gain." First dog looking out of window, laughing at second dog scratching himself.

There are three things, and only three, primarily necessary to the writing of a good scenario—brains, study and knowledge, enhanced by originality and thought.

TAYLOR'S SCHOOL DEMANDS MORE SPACE.

Mr. F. C. Taylor will move into more spacious quarters in the course of a few weeks. He has taken the large front room at 49 West Twenty-eighth street, owing to the increase of his students. Mr. Taylor will also have placed outside of the building, from top to bottom, display signs, so it will be impossible for anybody to miss his place. An operator will be stationed in the large front window of the room demonstrating the different makes of machines, etc. He issues a little booklet which will give the student an idea of what will be taught him. It is sent free to anyone asking for a copy.

The length of time it takes a student to learn the art of operating depends entirely upon his ability, but Mr. Taylor guarantees to teach a person with the average amount of intelligence in from two to four weeks. The demand for good operators at his school continues, but Mr. Taylor will not turn them out until he is confident that a student is competent to give a good entertainment.

A correspondence branch of this school will also be established for the edification of those who cannot appear in person.

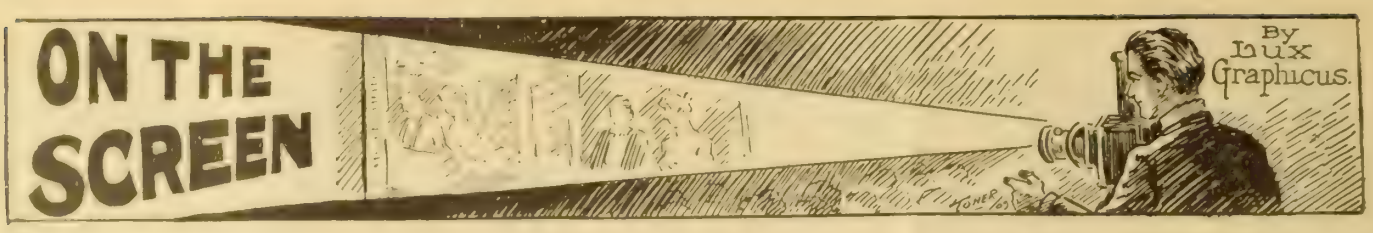
LEN SPENCER'S VOICE CULTURE SCHOOL.

Len Spencer, the song slide manufacturer, of 44 West Twenty-eighth street, New York City, has instituted a new branch of work in his building, and which will be a credit to the business in that it is designed for the voice culture of the song slide singers and when they secure employment their services are sure to be appreciated. This new department is a class devoted to the culture of the voice, and of which class Mr. Basil Storm is instructor. After the students have been thoroughly drilled in their work, they are given positions in moving picture theaters. Now we shall hope to hear singers who are worth listening to. The average vocalist of moving picture theaters can only sing one or two songs that they are acquainted with. In past issues of the paper we have advocated the necessity of a school of this sort, therefore Mr. Spencer deserves our heartiest praise on being the first to establish one.

PRESIDENT TAFT VIEWS ESSANAY AVIATION FILM.

Exhibition Under Auspices of Washington Aero Club—Other Aviation Pictures Shown.

President Taft, Vice-President Sherman, Speaker Cannon and about fifty Congressman attended an exhibition of moving pictures, given by the Washington Aero Club, under the direction of Courtland Field Bishop and other American aviators. The exhibition included the pictures: "Aeroplane Meet at Rheims, France," "Wright Brothers' Flight at Fort Meyer" and the Essanay's "Aviation at Los Angeles, Cal." The Essanay film was exhibited upon the special request of President Taft. Mr. Bishop, who was in charge of the Los Angeles meet, gave a special lecture on this film, which was highly complimented by all who viewed it. President Taft expressed himself as delighted with the exhibition and said some good things about moving pictures, along with his compliments to the American aviators.



I am a tired business man. That is to say for the purpose of writing this page of screen sermonizing this week, I put myself in the position of the "tired business man," whom we are told, on excellent authority, is a steady patron of the moving picture house, especially in the early part of the evening. The "tired business man" plays many parts in the world. He is said to be the chief supporter of the theatrical chorus; he is said to be the most afflicted person on the New York subway; he is said to be the man at whom the comic artists and the comic writer direct their choicest jokes. In fact, the "tired business man" is a pillar of the State.

So I thought I would go and study the "tired business man" at several moving picture theaters; I would watch him; I would question him as to what he thought about the pictures; I would find out if he was not only tired in business but tired of the pictures. Because, after all is said and done, though women and children are the main supporters of the picture theaters, the "tired business man" is the money earner. If he tires of the show himself it is reasonable to conjecture that he will put his foot down on the expenditure of any more five and ten cents. He will get too tired to let his wife and children go to the theater.

Apparently he is not tiring. There he sits steadily and loyally in the Broadway and Fourteenth street theaters, evening after evening, on his way up town. Sparing in his applause, he is nevertheless prodigal of appreciation and criticism. His taste looks to me to lean towards the humorous side of life, with a touch of the industrial and practical. "The tired business man" does not seem to want drama—nor does he seem much to care for history. He is too tired to worry his head about these things.

As I have said, his taste seems to lean towards comedy and humor. Just as mine does—being, as I have already said, "a tired business man." For, sometimes, the gentle reader may like to earn, I actually go to a moving picture theater, not for the purpose of looking at the pictures from the point of view of one who knows, or who thinks he knows, something about them, but simply by way of relaxation. It was in this mood that I sat in Mr. Gane's Broadway theater last Wednesday afternoon. I was tired when I went there—tired of many things which need not be specified. Apparently there were many more like me there, for it was just about 5 o'clock and the people were wending their way homeward.

We were all "tired business men" in our row. A very fat man sat on my left, and another man almost as portly on my right. They, like me, sat and enjoyed Essanay on Broadway. And the Essanay pictures were obviously very much to the taste of these tired business men who highly appreciated the two comedy subjects, "Oh, So Sick" and "The Winning of Father." In fact it seemed to me that the Essanay people have quite hit the taste of the Broadway public which likes a gentle ripple of humor running through its comedies—a public which goes to the theater to smile, to laugh, to be amused, but not to be saddened or depressed.

This was the kind of public that sat in Gane's Theater last Wednesday evening—"tired business men" with a sprinkling, of course, of younger people. They clearly wanted to be amused and they were amused. Of course I am not arguing in favor of a program of monotony; there must be some relief and variety in it, otherwise it would cloy. I want to make it clear that amongst the adult patrons of a theater. "tired business men" and women, the comedy subjects seem to be preferred.

It is interesting to notice the proportion of the various subjects which constitute a week's release. Out of 28 licensed releases for the week ending February 26, one was industrial, one was scenic, 20 were dramatic and 6 were comedy. This proportion, I venture to say, is not in accordance with the requirements of "tired business men" and others. There are not enough industrial and scenic, there are far too many dramatic and obviously not enough comedy. One comedy subject a day is clearly not enough, if the attitude of your "tired business man" at the entertainment be taken as a criterion.

If we look at the ordinary stage we see that the lighter form of entertainment is more popular and profitable than the heavy. In fact theater managers say that melodrama is as dead as a door nail. It is only good musical comedy or humorous themes which please the public. "The tired business man" seems to say that much the same sort of thing applies to the moving picture theater. Dramatic and heavy subjects are not liked so well as light comedy subjects. I have noticed on many occasions that the great feature pieces which the companies put out do not receive anything like the applause that they deserve in comparison with the light comedy subjects of shorter lengths. Take these two Essanay subjects which so won the favor of the Broadway tired business man; one is 479 feet and the other 508 feet. And indeed, parenthetically, I may remark, the makers seem to be leaning towards shorter subjects. That dear, good, "tired business man" is content with ten-minute doses instead of twenty-minute.

I would like to put in a word here for the magnificent way in which the pictures are shown at Mr. Gane's Broadway Theater. We three "tired business men" could find nothing to complain of in respect of the pictures, which were beautifully steady and evenly illuminated. Moreover, the fact that they are framed in a very handsome draped curtain enormously heightens the effect and shows them off exceedingly well. This is only the third time I have been in Gane's theater. Its handsomeness grows on me, and I am less disgruntled at the vaudeville acts than I was before, simply by way of thanks for the splendid manner in which the pictures are shown. My cup of happiness would be full if I could only persuade Mr. Gane to cut out vaudeville altogether and show nothing but the pictures.

It is true that my two "tired business men" friends and myself laughed at these very excellent vaudeville acts, which were generally well received, yet it seemed to me that the preponderance of favor went towards the pictures. The story which the pay box of a moving picture theater tells can never be doubted. I suppose, therefore, that vaudeville is a vital necessity on Fourteenth street and Broadway, yet I am still of the opinion that there is room for the moving picture house per se on Broadway and my tired business men friends were of the same opinion. There is another point for which I think Mr. Ganes should be thanked and that is for giving us such very nice music. He has a small orchestra which we three tired business men hugely appreciated. As I sat and listened to this little orchestra it seemed to me that perhaps the time was nearer than we imagined when the full orchestra will be given to the accompaniment of a picture show.

On the whole then, I am distinctly of the opinion that the "tired business man" is a loyal patron of the moving picture and that his allegiance is not likely to be shaken. The tired business man is a powerful factor in any community. He belongs to the better, one might say the best, class of the community. He goes to the moving picture theater for a little rest and recreation and not, as Dr. Anna Shaw would have us believe, for the purpose of dealing in vice. As a house of assignation the moving picture theater, speaking generally, is not in it with some chapels that could be named. But this is a digression. May the "tired business man" as a supporter of the moving picture theater live long and prosper! ! !

The City Hall Theater, 93 Park row, New York City, is just about to open as a first-class moving picture theater and has installed two Power's Cameragraphs, No. 5, New York approved equipment. The Bridge Theater, 118 Park Row, New York City, has just purchased two Power's Cameragraphs, No. 5, New York approved equipment.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Rheostat and Condenser.—Grove City, Pa., wants to know if the coils of two Power's 25-ampere rheostats can be changed so that the machines will deliver 35 amperes instead, off the same voltage? Also where the coils may be had? Certainly they can, and the maker of the rheostat is the one to furnish them. They will simply send you coils made from wire of larger diameter. He also wishes to know what focal length condensing lens to use on an 87-foot throw. Two 7½ condensers should fill the bill with the size picture you have. Get good grade condensers.

Quickly Prepared Announcement Slides.—Los Angeles, Cal., wants to know how he can make announcement slides with a typewriter. Get gelatin paper, in very light yellow or pink tints, from any dealer in supplies. Write your matter on this, using a black ribbon, and bind up between glass the same as any other slide, using mat, of course. If neatly done, with good ribbon, the slide will look well and the writing be celar and distinct on the screen.

Dry Batteries.—Des Moines, Ia., wants to know if dry batteries are of any account when worn out? Not that I know of.

Shutter Repair.—Burlington, Ia., asks if an old Edison two-pin shutter, which is in perfect condition, could be used on the one-pin Edison machine? No, it could not. It would be altogether too wide. You could trim it up, using a one-pin shutter (Edison) as a pattern, and use if it it will fit the spindle. Better get a new shutter, though, unless you know exactly what you are doing.

Rheostat Wire.—Chattanooga, Tenn., writes asking if common galvanized wire can be used for rheostat coils and how long they would last as compared to regular resistance wire; also, would there be any loss in their use as against the regular stock? Yes, ordinary iron wire may be used for resistance and its use would involve no loss as against the regular alloy coils. I believe, though, they will become hotter and their life will be comparatively short. In the long run, I think you would find the regular rheostat resistance wire much more satisfactory in every way. As a temporary makeshift to cut down current more than a given rheostat will do it, coils made up of iron wire will work perfectly. They should be placed in series with the coils of your rheostat.

Resistance and Voltage.—Toledo, Ohio, writes: "My rheostats heat badly. The coils get red-hot. They were all right when I used them on the city 110-volt circuit, but I am now using current from a private plant at 125 volts. Can you tell me if this has anything to do with the rheostats heating excessively? If so, what can I do to remedy it?"

Yes, the change of voltage has all to do with it. I take it you have rheostats built for 110 volts. When you put them on a line carrying 125 volts the extra pressure operates to force current through the coils beyond their normal capacity, thus heating them excessively. You may remedy the matter by purchasing special coils made for 125 volts and installing them in place of the old ones, or you may get a couple of coils and insulate them thoroughly on the wall of the operating room, protecting them with a proper guard so that no one can come in contact with them. Then, instead of running the wire from your rheostat to the lamp, run it to one end of these coils and from the other end of the coils to your lamp, thus cutting the coils in series with your rheostat. You may make coils out of ordinary iron fencing wire, but you will have to experiment to get the right length to give the current you want.

A GOOD REWINDER.

We had a visit this week from Mr. Carl J. Lang, the inventor and manufacturer of Lang's Rewinder, a most serviceable article which is highly spoken of by all exchanges and exhibitors. The Lang Rewinder has one special feature which alone should commend its use. There is a tension spring on the loaded spood end which insures a steady pull on the film and which can be regulated so that 1,000-foot films can be reeled within the limits of the 10-inch spool without having to stop and tighten up. This, of course, prevents scratching and tends to increase the life of the film.

PAWTUCKET, RHODE ISLAND.

By F. H. Richardson.

Last week the writer made a trip to the town Coats thread made famous—Pawtucket—to straighten out the troubles of a new theater. The owners had made the too common error of investing several thousand simoleons in the show business without first acquiring a knowledge of that business. Strange it is that men will do this. They would no more think of investing twenty-five thousand dollars, or half of that sum, in a drygoods business without first learning at least something of the conduct of such a business; but they cheerfully jump head over heels into the show business while as void of real knowledge as a new-born babe. They seem to think it is nothing at all but just "take in the money." Well, they find out different and purchase several large bales of experience at highest market price. In Pawtucket there are seven moving picture houses, most or all of which run more or less vaudeville in conjunction with the pictures. The current is alternating and they, all but one and the new house (which latter soon will), have installed motor-generator sets and are generating their own direct current for projection. They run good service and have very fine light. The shows, all that the writer saw, are excellent. The houses are good—some of them very nice. While there I met Mr. Davis, owner of the New Star Theater, a most affable gentleman, who has made a success of his house. Mr. Davis was proud of his show, as well he might be. The New Star is neat, comfortable and well filled and the projection (first-run film) is beyond criticism. Power's machines are in most of the houses, and the new one has two new Model No. 6's which are giving excellent satisfaction. There is a strike-lockout on at the big J. & P. Coats thread mills and it will hit the city pretty hard for a time.

LOCAL ADVERTISING.

Exhibitors are becoming interested in the articles in The Moving Picture World in reference to advertising their shows in the local papers. Every week we receive a batch of these advertisements and some are quite elaborate. C. S. Sullivan, manager of the Royal Theater, Calumet, Mich., sends us two specimens of his advertisement in the Calumet "News." The name of the theater is very boldly displayed and also the feature film of the day. The idea of giving a short synopsis of the story under the title is a good one, but in one advertisement this is overdone, in our estimation, by printing the complete story, and it is one of the long ones. It is open to question whether there are not many people who will be satisfied with the reading of the story and not go to see the film upon the screen, but who would have their interest aroused by a shorter synopsis.

DRAWING THE COLOR LINE.

An exhibitor from a town in Louisiana is confronted with the problem of separating the white and black patrons of his show and wants to know if it is not possible to place a division in the middle of his place, topped with a curtain on which the picture can be projected from one end and be visible on either side of the screen. He also wishes to know the best fabric to use for this purpose. As the picture is projected from behind the screen in many places, the job of projecting a satisfactory picture through the screen presents little difficulty and the screen may be plain bleached muslin of good quality. Its translucence can be improved by a suitable sizing, or better still would be a screen of the translucent material known as architect's tracing cloth. But our correspondent will find that he runs up against another proposition which is more difficult of solution: On one side of the screen the lettering of the titles and all reading matter will be reversed, which would be rather annoying to those who cannot read backwards. The only solution for this would be to erect a large mirror at the opposite end of the hall and have the blacks or whites sit with their backs to the screen on one side. Of course, we in the North are not so keen on race prejudice, but we should imagine that reserving one side for each race would be sufficient segregation.

OHIO NOTES.

Mr. Elmer T. Lewis, manager, Theater Royal, at Sandusky, Ohio, states that he installed a 550 volt, direct current, "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizer last October. He speaks very highly of it and says that it produces the most beautiful light ever seen on any curtain, and his total bill has been reduced more than one-half. Mr. Lewis suggests that if anyone is in doubt as to the great work of the "Hallberg" Economizer, he would be glad to answer any questions a prospective purchaser may wish to ask.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"The Englishman and the Girl" (Biograph).—To have a joke turned on them, and by an Englishman, too, is not the fortune of every company of lively Americans; but here is an instance where it is done. The Biograph players make the picture very real and succeed admirably in carrying out the spirit of the picture. To be set upon by a company of Indians was the fate of this Englishman, an amateur dramatic company supplying the means by which it was accomplished; but it is quite a novel turn in affairs to have the Englishman seize a gun and axe and chase the prepetrators of the joke out of the place and into hiding. It is a neat and attractive bit of humor, satisfactory in every sense, dramatically and pictorially, and received loud applause.

"A Honeymoon Through Snow and Into Sunshine" (Lubin).—Wading through huge snow drifts, the result of the recent blizzard, is a rather chilly way of beginning a honeymoon. But the scene changes. The swift train bears them to the South and there, amid the picturesque scenery at St. Augustine, Palm Beach and other Southern resorts, there is a bit of a quarrel to liven up things, but probably the principal interest will center in the scenic qualities, which are especially good. The fact that a little story is connected with it prevents the scenery from palling upon those who see it, and the sudden transition from deep snow to Summer sunshine adds emphasis to the beauty of the Southern pictures. Well photographed by an operator who understands the selection of view points, the entire picture is pleasing and to an extent educational.

"The Girls of the Range" (Selig).—One of those snappy Western pictures, so many of which have come from this studio. While this is of a slightly different type, the fact remains that it is quite as pleasing and is, in every way, quite as satisfactory as those which have gone before. There is plenty of action, plenty of dash and go and plenty of the Selig quality which assists materially in making these pictures popular.

Scene from "The Girl of the Range" (Selig).

"The Miniature" (Edison).—A picture of a duel is not particularly interesting in most instances, but in this one the Edison Company have reproduced a historic incident with such close fidelity to facts and such consummate skill in working out the details that one becomes interested. Andrew Jackson is one of the most picturesque and rugged characters in American history, and when he is drawn into a deliberate plot to kill him in a duel there is a feeling of elation when he shoots down his opponent. The miniature of his wife in his pocket stopped the bullet and saved his life. The dramatic qualities of the picture are high, and the photographer was quite as accurate in his part of the production, the result being a finished film which has all the elements that go to make a motion picture interesting.

"A Trip to Mars" (Edison).—A comic which is intensified and made even more interesting by the interpolation of magic. The professor who upsets gravity gets a quick trip to Mars and has a succession of experiences there which are not altogether pleasing; and when he is shot back into his own laboratory he probably has no serious regrets. But, unfortunately, his marvelous powders upset his floor, and he gets another whirl through space, and is still spinning when the picture ends. It is all amusing and is managed with consummate skill.

"The Trapper and the Redskins" (Kalem).—This firm has added to its company some real Indians who are gifted with histrionic ability, and this is the first of what they call a series of hummers. If the others are as good as these there will be no complaint. It has all the thrills that are usually included between the covers of the most exciting novels. Inasmuch as there are real Indians included in the cast, the little details often overlooked by white men who are acting Indian parts are correctly introduced, adding materially to the strength of the picture. Steadily this firm is improving in its work and the first of its Indian series is an augury of a brilliant future in this direction.

"Panicky Picnic" (Pathe).—Fortunately not all picnics are so seriously disturbed as this one, so those who are contemplating picnics this season need not feel worried about such possibilities. However, the sympathy of those who may have been disturbed in previous picnics will go out to those who are unfortunate enough to be a part of this one, where panics seem to be the common lot of all.

"Muriel's Strategem" (Vitagraph).—A pretty little story which represents a girl who is opposed in her love affair by her grandfather. She overcomes his objection by impersonating her grandmother, whom she resembles very closely, and who eloped with her grandfather, and chiding him for his opposition to Muriel. The little strategem works to perfection and his consent to the match is speedily given. It is one of those tender little stories that stir one more, perhaps, by the memories aroused than because of any intrinsic merit in the story itself. The acting is quite in harmony with the subject and the pictorial end has been well taken care of. The picture should enjoy a long run because of its tenderness and beauty.

"Beautiful Windermere" (Vitagraph).—A study of some of the charming rural scenery in England. Lake Windermere is apparently an exceptionally beautiful locality and there is plenty about it to make the traveler want to linger indefinitely. It is an ideal place, visited alike by the artist, the poet and many others who delight in the wondrously attractive scenery of England. The photography is so good in this that one almost feels as though he were actually visiting the scenes depicted.

"Three Queens and a Jack" (Pathe).—A bit of comedy that amuses the audience and shows what can happen under certain conditions which might or might not be actual.

"Fate Against Her" (Pathe).—Here is a bit of strong drama, well acted and clearly photographed, yet, withal, conveying a somewhat depressing influence. Fate is a Nemesis which confronts most people in some way, though in no two instances the same; and there is always sympathy when one person sees another in the toils. The marked improvement in dramas recently, with reference to this particular feature of gloom, has pleased a considerable proportion of the patrons of the motion picture. This is not to be condemned, since perhaps it will arouse thoughts which may lead to sympathy for the unfortunate.

"The Cowboy and the Squaw" (Essanay).—A Western picture containing something of the spirit of the plains and showing a rattling good chase across country by the cowboys who are after a squaw that killed one white man to save another. However, the squaw and her lover escape and the posse ride leisurely back, satisfied that the squaw has, after all, only performed a service. The wild riding of the cowboys is interesting, as it always is, and the scenic effects are well worked out. It is a satisfactory Western picture.

"Life of Moses; V.—The Promised Land" (Vitagraph).—The fifth and last picture in this great series. So far as quality is concerned it is quite up to the standard set by the others and concludes what is one of the marvels in motion picture making. To properly stage these pictures is one of the greatest achievements this enterprising company has to its credit, and its interpretation of the life and times of that early date is to be commended from every standpoint. The series forms a set of pictures which should form a prominent part of a program in every chruch and Sunday school in the country. Although, perhaps rather too theatrical to please some folks, it will give the children a new and far more satisfactory understanding of the Bible story than they could obtain in any other way. To follow the children of Israel in this graphic way from bondage through to the promised land is an education in biblical history which could be obtained in no other way. No other method so satisfactory could be devised. Churches which may desire to make Lent a notable season this year would do well to make up a program of this series and present it for the benefit of their congregations.

"Better Than Gold" (Gaumont).—A strongly dramatic picture, beautifully photographed and satisfactorily acted, which interprets this old saying so clearly and graphically that its meaning cannot be mistaken. Sometimes it is well to offer dramas of this character. They not infrequently cause the thoughtless to pause and consider what is to be the outcome of the mad worship of gold which characterizes modern life. And this one is well played in every particular.

"The Comedy-Graph" (Gaumont).—The comedians representing this house have brought out a laugh producer in this which will not fail to put any audience in good humor. It is funny, and in addition is well acted and clearly photographed.

"His Last Burglary" (Biograph).—Here is a novel and good story, worked out with all the close attention to details for which the Biograph people are famous. To carry out the idea of a burglar stealing a baby, and one that had just been left in the house, is novel. Then, when the burglar reforms and discovers to whom it belongs and restores it during the night, another jog is given to the conventional order of things. It is impossible to realize the interest the dramatic situations excite without seeing the picture. A baby is an interesting subject at any time, and under the circumstances herewith depicted it attracts even greater interest. The ending, with the baby returned to its grieving mother and the burglar reformed, is good enough to call for more than ordinary commendation.

"The Gunby's Sojourn in the Country" (Pathe).—Here is a comedy which will be appreciated by those who have had experiences of different sorts in the country. It will keep the audience in good humor. That much is certain. And any comedy which does that fulfills its mission and performs an important function in the world of motion pictures.

"The New Marshal at Gila Creek" (Lubin).—Here is a stirring Western comedy drama with some thrilling action. It is of the detective type, showing the marshal in a disguise which protects him perfectly until he succeeds in rounding up the bad men and makes an important arrest. The gang of bad men in Gila Creek meet their match in the guise of an apparently semi-idiotic old farmer and their ringleader is arrested, which affords much pleasure to the audience, as these things always do. A love story runs through it, supplying the heart interest required to make it interesting. The action is strong and seems in entire harmony with the subject and the ending is sufficiently pleasant to satisfy the most fastidious critic in that respect.

"Paid in Full" (Vitagraph).—A strongly dramatic picture acted with the fidelity to the subject which characterizes the work of the Vitagraph players. An interesting touch is added by laying the scenes in a desert standstorm, continuing in little known Algiers and on to Monte Carlo and Paris. The heart interest is developed in a French officer inducing the wife of an Arab, who befriended him in the desert, to elope with him to Algiers. The husband follows and finds his wife just as she has been deserted by her paramour and is dying of poison. He forgives her and follows the officer to Paris, then to Monte Carlo, and there hurls him over a cliff where he is killed on the stones below. Even though this picture has one death, at least which seems unnecessary, the killing of the recreant Frenchman seems deserved and one almost wants to applaud. The action is strong, the story moving along in a relentless way which seems the embodiment of irresitible fate. The acting rises to heights of strong dramatic power at times and excites the admiration of the audience because of its power. The photography is clear and the representation of the sandstorm is a clever piece of work. "Paid in Full" will rank as a more than ordinarily attractive film.

"A Family Outing" (Urban).—A bit of a comedy which will call up amusing recollections and create a storm of laughter almost always when shown. Probably more than one who sees the picture will recall related experiences in the same general direction, and consequently the picture possesses more than a passing interest. Its memory will linger long and unquestionably it will always be pleasant.

"The Miser's Child" (Kalem).—A melodrama in which a love story and a plot to steal an orphan's fortune and force her to marry a man against her will, are important elements. The romance of the sea, the added romance of the greed for money and the unprotected orphan are important factors. When the lover returns, stops the wedding and puts a stop to all the persecution there is a general sigh of relief. The interest in these melodramatic pictures naturally centers about the lovers, all other scenes and actors being but accessories. But they are triumphant, hence the picture carries with it much of interest and not a little satisfaction. The dramatic work is good, and so is the photography. Altogether it is up to the average output of this house.

"The Lamp Post Inspector" (Pathe).—A comedy which might be a dig at politicians who attempt to secure fool places for their supporters. There is rather broad humor connected with the picture, but it keeps the audience good-natured throughout.

"O, So Sick!" (Essanay).—A comedy from this house which keeps the audience laughing and leaves them in good humor. It has all the snap and dash of the usual Essanay comedy and is lively enough to suit the most exacting.

"The Winning of Father" (Essanay).—The story of how an athletic young man succeeds in inducing his sweetheart's father to consent to the match. The vigorous action of a college athlete is quite likely to result in a settlement satisfactory to the young couple, and this instance is no exception. There is a rush and a fidelity to actual life in this which is refreshing and maintains the interest from beginning to end.

"Dooley's Holiday" (Bison).—Perhaps this is the same Dooley who had a remarkable experience with a turkey at Thanksgiving. At any rate, it must be his twin brother if it isn't him, because the remarkable experiences seem to be injected into the holiday and before the film ends the audience is treated to a series of adventures as amusing as they are remarkable and unexpected.

"The Impostor" (Bison).—A dramatic picture which carries one through many interesting and thrilling vicissitudes, ending with a romance sure to please, and contributing much to the attractiveness of the film. The photography is a distinct advance over some of the previous ones sent out by this firm, and the acting is equally in harmony with the subject.

"Louise Strozzi" (Itala).—A story of love, devotion and villainy mixed. The treachery of a faithless friend is graphically illustrated and the fidelity of the wife who would rather die than do wrong is produced with close attention to details. The acting and photography are alike good.

"Jane and the Stranger" (Imp).—A man hunt which ends differently. When the sister is avenged it is but natural, perhaps, to look for the ending of the picture there, and, in truth, it is a good story to that point. The average man is thrilled when a coward is put out of the way by someone nobler and braver than himself, and this scene is no exception to that rule. But here, indeed, is full measure, pressed down and running over. A strong love story, with a few thrills and a more than ordinarily satisfactory ending, follows and the picture closes with the lovers surrounded by their friends, who are offering not only hearty, but vigorous congratulations. There is a wealth of good live action, without distortion of facts, and the sentiment developed is sufficient to satisfy the most critical. The death of the cowardly cur who deserted his wife and baby seems but an act of justice, consequently there is no sense of too much bloodshed. It is, altogether, a very satisfying production.

"For Her Father's Honor" (Bison).—A picture containing some romance and a good deal of illuminating explanation of the way gamblers play cards. It involves a love story, too, in which a girl sacrifices herself to save her father's honor, or what is assumed in the code of the gambler to be honor. But the gambler's trickery is discovered and the wedding is stopped, while the lovers are united and the gambler is banished in the vigorous fashion usually adopted by cowboys under such circumstances. The picture contains much that is interesting in its scenery, its acting and its suggestion. Its photography is clear in most of the scenes, though in some it is a trifle weak. As a whole, however, it is a creditable piece of work, melodramatic, perhaps, but alive and emotional.

"Face to Face" (Eclair).—A film, the scene of which is laid in France in revolutionary times. It is based upon the fact that an officer, a royalist, is compelled to sentence his son, who has been captured with many other Republicans, to death. A servant succeeds in managing things so the son is saved from execution. It is a touching story, well worked out and well photographed. It is an advance upon some previous work of this house and is, in most respects, an excellent film. Here and there a weak spot in photography shows, but it would be easy to correct them. Aside from this the film is excellent.

"Duty and Conscience" (Eclair).—A picture based upon a violation of the European game laws and showing how a kindhearted gamekeeper relieves the distress of a poacher whom he arrested. The scenic qualities of the film are quite satisfactory and there are some dramatic situations which deserve commendation. The photography is not entirely up to the standard, however, but most of the picture is so good that these minor corrections could easily be made and the film would then possess a high photographic standard.

"The Witches' Ballad" (Ambrosio).—A fairy legend of Italy, which, while not possessing any great characteristics, is, after all, a very entertaining film. Some of the scenic effects are beautiful, showing picturesque bits well worth seeing. The legend is worked out with skill and the photography is generally good. Withal it is a satisfactory film.

"Why Tricot Was Sent to College" (Ambrosio).—A comedy which explains why the gentleman mentioned, and does it in such a genuinely humorous way that the audience laughs from beginning to end. The action is lively and the photography is good.

"In Arizona" (Nestor).—Here is a film, in which the characters are acted by the firm's own company of actors, assisted by a troupe of genuine cowboys. Naturally a combination of that character has produced a film of the popular kind. The life and customs of the country are well produced. The background against which the actors work is typical and displays a wise choice in making selections. The film has been commended by competent critics, the more sanguine of whom refer to it as indicative of the great improvement which has taken place in the production of American motion pictures.

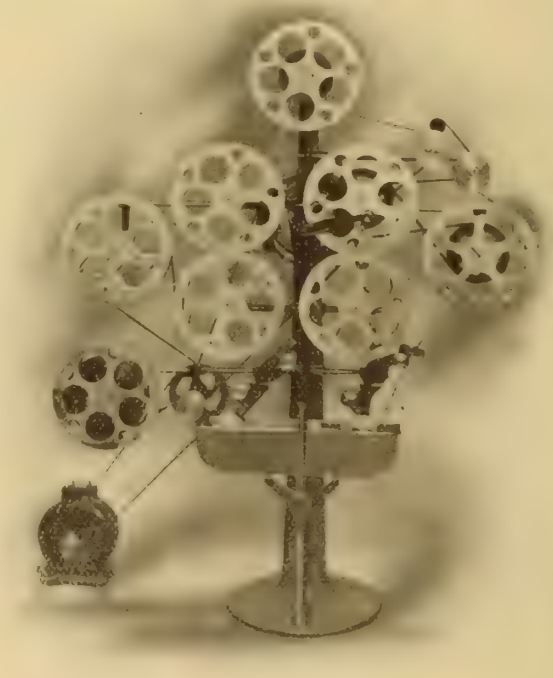
"The Runaway Stove" (Lux).—A novel knockabout comedy depicting a runaway stove, which wanders all over town, creating all sorts of disturbances in some instances, but acting as a benefit in others. After a time it returns and is prevented from further peringrinations by binding it in place with a strong rope.

"The Fisherman's Honor" (Lux).—A strongly dramatic film, representing a fisherman as determined to kill his little son to save his own honor. The little one discloses the hiding place of some fugitives whom the authorities want. The father takes him to the seashore to kill him, but the mother rushes upon the scene at the last moment and saves the child's life. As can be easily understood, the picture is intensely dramatic, and the actors make the most of the opportunities offered.

"The Ten of Spades" (Bison).—A truly Western drama rendered by the company which is now working in California. The imagination is stretched a bit in some of the situations, but it is well connected and stirring enough to please the average audience.

FILM WATERPROOFING AND CLEANING.

In our report of the address delivered by W. A. Daniels, president of the National Waterproof Film Co., before the F. S. A. Convention, we quoted him as saying: "We have never claimed that our coating would add strength to a film, but we do claim that it will not lessen the strength." As a matter of fact Mr. Daniels said: "We have never claimed that our coating would add unlimited strength to a film." Now, we like to be precise on matters dealing with the good and welfare of the business, so we requested Mr. Daniels to send us a section of the coating that they applied to the gelatine side of the film. He very courteously did so, and we cut it up into strips of regulation film width and found after proper test that these strips of the thin, transparent pellicle, as delicate to the touch as tissue paper, had a lifting strength of ten pounds. So that it is evident that a film that has been subjected to the waterprofing process will stand at least ten pounds extra strain before it will break.



Wideawake exchanges are also not slow in seeing the advantage of keeping their films spotlessly clean by the simple process of running them through the washing machine. Fred C. Aiken, of the Theater Film Service Co., Chicago, is having one of the machines installed, and his customers will soon be able to note the difference in the brightness of their pictures—not that the Theater Film Service has not always been of the best quality, but it shows their progressive spirit when they very promptly avail themselves of any innovation that will still further improve it.

We show above a cut of the washing machine. It can be operated by any girl or boy. Only soap and water is placed in the washing trough and the film is automatically scrubbed as it passes through the water and thence over drying pads on the various reels until it reaches the rewind perfectly dry and clean.

It is safe to say that the waterproofing and washing process has so many good features to recommend it that it has come to stay.

Bellaire, Ohio.—The Spragg Amusement Company, operating the Olympic Theater at Bellaire, Ohio, has just leased the Columbia Theater, the only regular theatrical house in the city, which has a seating capacity of 1,700, and will operate it as an exclusive motion picture house. Two new Motiograph machines have been installed. The company will continue to operate both houses.

THE SOUNDOGRAPH.

This apparatus, which created so much comment at the film men's convention, is now on exhibition at the Imperial Film Exchange, 44 West Twenty-eighth street, New York, where Mr. Levine, the manager, is pleased to arrange a demonstration for any exhibitor. We have heard incidentally from exhibitors who have installed the Soundograph that they are well pleased with their investment and we would advise Eastern exhibitors to call and see and hear it at the office of the Imperial Film Exchange.

SELIG NOTES.

Closely upon the announcement of the addition of Elbert Hubbard to the Selig writing staff, comes the announcement of the closing of a contract by that firm with Opie Reade for the production of his famous works that are read throughout the civilized world and have long since found a place in every public and private library in the country. The first book to be produced in film will be "A Kentucky Colonel," with others of his more important works to follow.

Mr. Reade is a member of the Press Club of Chicago, as well as belonging to numerous clubs and societies of the "Windy City." He is now on an extensive lecturing tour of the States and will soon return to enter upon his new duties and superintend the production of his various books.

William V. Mong has sold all picture rights and titles to his copyrighted version of "The Clay Baker," together with his services, to the Selig Polyscope Company, Inc.

The Selig Polyscope Company adds other stock companies to their fast growing interests. In addition to the excellent stock maintained in their Los Angeles studio, they now have very strong producing organizations in New Orleans and Old Mexico, and are just preparing to send producers to Japan and the Orient. These announcements coming as they do upon the heels of arrangements to double the present capacity of the Chicago plant, makes it more apparent to the picture interests that there must be some activity at 45 Randolph street.

Not a showman in the country but who has heard of M. B. Curtiss, and it was a stroke of good business judgment when the Selig Polyscope Company secured the rights for "Samuel of Posen," together with Mr. Curtiss in his original part of "Sammy." The story starts in far away Posen, Germany, and after varied and strenuous experiences in the new world, ending with a prearranged fire sale in Baxter street, New York, we are carried back to old Posen, the home of his birth. The photography and story are both of high quality and the film promises great popularity with the exhibitor.

ESSANAY NOTES.

Work is to begin on several new big buildings for the Essanay Film Company, store houses, carpenter and machine shops and a new addition to the photographic department. With the opening of Spring the company will begin work on their grounds, the artificial lake will be completed, while clearings will be made for the erection of outdoor sets.

The Essanay studio is to be fitted with double its present artificial lights. The Essanay Company has purchased a number of scenarios which call for gigantic indoor scenes. With the increased lights, it will be possible to produce pictures with settings of enormous proportions.

"An Interrupted Honeymoon," a big full reel comedy, ready for release March 9, is said to be one of the funniest Essanay comedies released in a long time.

When the Essanay aviation film, "Aviation at Los Angeles, Cal.," which was shown to President Taft, his cabinet, and a number of Congressmen, was ready to be shipped on to New York it was found that no train was leaving Washington in time to arrive in New York on the time previously set. As it was necessary for the film to reach the Waters Film Exchange before noon Tuesday, Mr. Courtland F. Bishop undertook to deliver the film himself. A special train was made ready and the film delivered to the Waters Exchange by no less wealthier messenger than Mr. Bishop himself.

The Essanay's "Ranch Girl's Legacy," a Western comedy film, is reported to be the best of this variety since their notable Western comedy, "The Best Man Wins." It is released Saturday, March 5.

The Essanay's Saturday release of Western and high-class dramatic films continue very popular with the exhibitors. One enterprising Western exhibitor, Glen D. Hurst, of the Isis Theater, Reno, Nev., tells of some methods he has of stimulating the interest of the public in the films shown in his theater. Mr. Hurst was formerly a newspaper man and not only knows what the people like in the way of film subjects, but knows how to get space in the Reno papers. He writes splendid articles on the moving picture business and gets considerable space in advertising any special feature film which he may show during the week. An article on "Making Moving Pictures In the West" preceded some of the Essanay Western films. "Now," writes Mr. Hurst, "when I advertise such films as 'His Reformation,' 'The Best Man Wins' and 'The Cowboy and the Squaw,' I always show to packed houses." Another scheme for creating interest adopted by Mr. Hurst is a scenario contest. Three prizes are offered for the three best scenarios, and the winners will probably see their productions on the screen. The Essanay producers will act as judges in this contest and if the stories are available to them will produce them.

The film exchanges and exhibitors are commenting very highly on the Essanay's latest dramatic production, "The Price of Fame." It is considered, by many of them, the best dramatic production, from the Essanay Company, released in a long time.

G. M. Anderson, the Western producer of the Essanay Company, tells a funny story about picture taking in Santa Barbara, Cal. The prohibition question is a big topic in Santa Barbara, the town seeming to be about equally divided with these two factions. Recently Mr. Anderson made a picture with several of the scenes in front of Santa Barbara saloons. The saloon element was under the impression that the prohibition forces were to reap the benefit of the pictures. Quite a stir was created over the affair, and neither of the factions were satisfied until Anderson promised to take no more pictures in front of saloons.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

In the interest of our readers, we again call attention to the tragic drama, "Elektra," which the Vitagraph Company will soon release. This will be the piece de resistence and the greatest picture play ever produced for the benefit and enjoyment of the public. From the standpoint of scenic and costume elegance, it is unsurpassed. The correctness of detail and the vigor and dramatic power of acting displayed by the all-star company make it superb in every particular.

This is not all; there are other surprises and meritorious renditions for the lovers of drama and comedy. Here are a few that should be borne in mind: "The Tongue of Scandal," a melodrama of human sympathy in opposition to intolerant prejudice and scandal; "The Girl in the Barracks," a modern drama of love in a Russian military barracks with moments of intensity; "Uncle Tom's Cabin," with reproductions of scenes and characters "before the war," presenting the story with all its dramatic incidents and faithfulness to facts and topography of the period; and "St. Elmo," a dramatization of the well known story of this name; "A Funny Story," a comedy of laughs in which everybody takes part and laughs with everybody else.

The Vitagraph release, on March 22, of the dramatic subject, "Capital vs. Labor," will be one of the most extraordinary moving picture dramas of the year. It is peculiarly fetching in its variation of climax and powerful in its purpose, the supremacy of right over might. Interwoven with the stirring intensity of the mob scenes and the piercing sincerity of the acting there is the soothing charm of a most delicate love story in which the man of heart and moral courage proves superior to the man of power and violence.

LUBIN NOTES.

Unless a decidedly unfavorable change in the weather takes place, the contractors expect to turn the new studio and factory over to the Lubin Manufacturing Company by the middle of March and promise the most perfect picture plant in existence. From twelve to twenty scenes can be erected at once in the spacious all-glass studio, or the whole big floor space may be utilized for a single stupendous picture.

The section of the Lubin Stock Company sent South for the Winter has been sending back some notably attractive releases, but now they have gone further afield than Florida their first stopping place, and are established in the West Indies, the most recent work being even more attractive than the "New Marshal" or "The Ranger and the Girl."

The Mondays and Wednesdays are Lubin release days and, as St. Patrick's Day falls on a Thursday this year, first run exhibitors will profit by the release for that day, "The Irish Boy." One of the settings, showing a cabin in Ireland, is from a famous painting, one of the poses reproducing that painting entire, and the factory scenes later shown were done in an actual machine shop, the heavy equipment of lights and reflectors being especially installed for two scenes from the play.

The other week a theatrical company was closed at one of the Philadelphia theaters, the stoppage being not entirely disassociated with a failure to pay salaries that had become chronic. Many of the players were stranded in town with New York only $2.50 away. One of the company was acquainted with a member of the Lubin Stock Company, and learning that extra people were needed communicated the joyous fact to his companions. "Marriage in Haste," as a result, shows more high priced actors in a mob than any picture ever produced, and the players moved on to New York convinced that there was something in pictures after all. The film is set for release March 7, and is a comedy story of unusual novelty.

GREAT NORTHERN NOTES.

The enterprise of the moving picture manufacturer is shown by the fact that the Great Northern Film Company announce for their release of March 5 a drama by Sopus Michaelis, the Danish author and playwright. It is entitled "A Wedding During the French Revolution," and is just the kind of subject that lends itself to the elaborate setting and beautiful photographic rendering for which this company is noted.

It is also worthy of note that the same drama, under the title of "A Son of the People," will shortly be produced at the famous New Theater, in New York City, with John Mason in the cast. The American rights of the drama by Michaelis were purchased by the Schuberts, who have also purchased "Napoleon at St. Helena," by the same author.

Mr. Sophus Michaelis, with his talented wife, is now in this country, the guests of his brother-in-law, Baron Dahlerub at New Rochelle. They will remain here until after the presentation of "A Son of the People."

Madame Michaelis is herself an author of note in Denmark and throughout Scandinavia and one of her novels, "The Child," has been translated into English. In Austria her books stand fourth in popularity among the authors whose works are sold there.

The Great Northern Company are to be congratulated on having the collaboration of such distinguished writers and they expect to feature a new play, "The Little Mother," on which Madame Michaelis is now at work.

NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE COMPANY'S NOTES.

The Bison Stock Company, now in the Northwest producing new subjects for the New York Motion Picture Company, is composed of many well known stage favorites. Among the prominent members of the company are: Miss Jewell Darrell, Miss Evelyn Graham, J. B. Sherry, Charles Avery, Frank Montgomery, Major McGuire, Wm. Gibbons and Charles K. French. As the company has had great success in producing subjects of life on the plains, they have secured two genuine Indians, Young Deer and Red Wing, members of the Winnebago tribe, both of whom have posed for some of the best known artists in this country and are perfect types of their race. Mr. Fred J. Balshofer, stage director of the company, is one of the pioneer motion picture men in America. The motion picture in its perfected state is a little more than ten years old, and for that length of time Mr. Balshofer has been engaged in producing films that have caused wide comment among those familiar with the business.

"IMP" FILMS ARE REALISTIC.

It is a trick with moving picture producers, when it is necessary to show a dead baby on the sheet, to cover a dummy and lay it on the bed as required. But now, for the first time in the history of moving picture making, the feat of using a real baby has been accomplished. An eighteen-months-old infant was put to sleep in the studio; the entire company waited for two hours for this to be done, for baby was feeling pretty frisky and seemed decidedly inclined to view the proceedings. As soon as the producer was sure that the child was fast asleep it was taken up and all hands tiptoed into the scene. The picture shows the infant on a little bed, face to the camera, with nary a quiver of an eyebrow to destroy the illusion that it had just passed into the land of angels, nor did it move a muscle all through the scene. About an hour after a series of lusty yells proved that the kid was only acting. The extraordinary pains taken with the child are characteristic of the treatment of every detail in the next release of the Imp, "Mother Love," a play destined to take first rank in moving picture production.

NESTOR FILM NOTES.

Beautiful tinting and toning will mark the releases of the Nestor studio in the future, as a special department has been fitted up for that purpose and an expert placed in charge of this work.

The Nestor studio is now in course of construction and no expense will be spared to make it complete in every way. There will be room for the simultaneous staging of four plays and the lighting effects will enable the production of pictures either night or day.

The return of this company to cowboy subjects has caused a marked increase in the demand for Nestor films, compelling the factory to work overtime every night during the past week.

Bonehead paid a short visit to the Nestor studio this week and will no doubt be able to work again in a short time, to the great joy of the numerous exhibitors who like clean comedy subjects such as the Bonehead series proved to be.

FOR PENNSYLVANIA EXHIBITORS.

Having established an enviable reputation for first-class lantern slides and song slide service throughout Pennsylvania, the Novelty Slide Company, of New York City, have found it necessary to open a branch office in Scranton, Pa., so as to be in a better position to handle the rapidly increasing trade from that section. The Scranton office is located in the Real Estate Exchange Building and is under the capable management of Chas. V. Meinzer, an energetic, experienced moving picture man, who has made many friends by his honest, straightforward way of doing business. This office is well stocked with a large selection of late popular songs, also travelogues, lecturettes and Novelty Puzzlettes are on hand for rental. In addition, a complete line of all the Novelty Slide Company's lantern slide products and moving picture specialties are carried in stock. Exhibitors will find Mr. Meinzer always ready and anxious to solve their slide troubles, and all inquiries and orders will receive prompt attention.

STOLEN PROPERTY.

An epidemic of thefts of apparatus and films seems to have broken out. Just as we go to press we are informed that a Power's machine, No. 5 (serial No. 2525), was stolen from Chas. Steiner, of the Essex Theater, 133 Essex street, New York. The thief also lifted the following reels: "Voice of the Violin" (Biograph), "Paris Flood" and "Twin Brothers" (Vitagraph), "The Little Beggar" and "Panicky Picnic" (Pathe) and "Woman's Stratagem" (Edison). A reward is offered for information that will lead to the recovery of the property.

E. H. Duffy, formerly of the Calumet Film Exchange, and Wm. J. Liederman, formerly of the United States Film Exchange, have joined the staff of Eugene Cline at Chicago.

Mr. Budd Menzel, for many years associated with the Chicago Film Exchange, now has charge of the force of traveling men representing Eugene Cline.

The Actophone Company are releasing one reel a week at present and the quality of the product is very good. They are trying, in the quality of the story, the class of acting and the photography, to uphold the standard of Independent films.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM A DENVER EXHIBITOR.

Denver, Col., Feb. 21, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—We desire to inform you that a change is to be made in the Grand Theater, 657 Jason street, which we only a few months ago purchased from an independent concern, and immediately changed to a licensed house. It will be removed from its present location into a new building at 763 Jason street, built especially for a picture show, well ventilated and lighted, making it among one of the best picture houses in Denver.

The seating capacity is to be increased to 300, and with the present West Side Theater, the seating capacity in our location will be 600. These houses run strictly licensed pictures only.

We started about a year ago with a small house, enlarging same in about six months from time of starting. Being located in a residential district, we cater mostly to ladies and children, and always run suitable pictures for such patrons, thereby building up our trade.

Shortly after starting our house, an independent house started at the present location of the Theater Grand, but owing to the class of pictures shown, failed to make a success. This is the theater which we bought, and by installing licensed pictures soon built up the patronage of the theater to such a point that it now requires a larger building.

Yours respectfully,
MYERS & HALE.

Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Would like to inquire through your paper if any exchange throughout the country has done any business with a man by the name of Wm. Fudge. If you will communicate with the undersigned, it may be to everybody's advantage, owing to the fact that this man has never returned the six reels of film and three sets of song slides that were shipped to him upon his order some two or three months ago. Any advice received from any of the exchanges in reference to this man will be amply rewarded, as there is a standing reward of $100 for the knowledge and conviction of this party if found.

Knowing that your paper has a wide circulation, I ask you to kindly print this for me.

Yours very truly,

The Editor of the Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—As a subscriber to your paper, and my knowledge of your striving to discourage thievery in the moving picture business, I kindly request you to publish in your valuable paper a few facts, as follows:

On Thursday night, February 10, some one broke into my theater and stole the head of a type B Edison moving picture machine. It was a one-pin movement; the serial number being 10,743 and the license number 693. From my observation and the clues left I have come to the conclusion that it was someone in the business and know well enough that by publishing the same in your paper the exhibitors will be on the lookout for the knave. The two magazines and two Edison lamps were also taken.

Hoping you will publish these few facts, and thanking you, I am Yours Respectfully,
A. T. MALMED.

INDISCRIMINATE CONDEMNATION.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—The writer was astonished to read the article credited to H. F. Hoffman in last week's World, entitled, "A New Race of Degenerates." In effect, the man classes all operators in all cities as degenerates. In effect, he says that I, myself, am a degenerate, and that my hundreds of operator friends of Chicago, and in other cities, are to be classed the same. True, he qualifies by saying that not every person seen in an exchange is degenerate, but he seems careful not to say every "operator." Presumably, his qualification only covers those who happen in, other than operators. Now, there are in Chicago, and other cities of this fair land, hundreds of operators whom the writer is proud to number among his friends. They are not degenerates in any sense of the word. Chicago operators, as a whole, will compare favorably with any other class of craftsmen, I believe. Of New York operators I know little or nothing, but it is strange if there are no decent men among them, even taking into consideration the fact that the wage paid here is not such as is likely to attract high-class men. With such sweeping condemnation the writer has no patience at all. The most charitable view of the writer of such an article is to believe he is prejudiced. Did he say that some moving picture operators are degenerates, I would not disagree, though I might feel that the publication of such fact is not creditable to the business and can serve no good purpose. Sweeping condemnation is not logical. It is merely the platitudinous insulting of many good men to get a more or less deserved fling at others. But that fling could be as well or better taken were the writer to specify the fact that he only aims at the class of men who deserve condemnation. But, as I said before, it may reasonably be questioned if Mr. Hoffman's position is tenable, and if not, it certainly places him in the position of giving an equally prominent explanation or apology. F. H. RICHARDSON.

The Excela Soundograph

The only complete and up-to-date effect-producing machine ever invented is now complete and ready for the exhibitors. Everybody pronounces it a wonder. Almost any sound or effect imaginable is easily and realistically produced by simply turning a crank, pulling a handle or pushing a button. The effects are all mounted in a handsome cabinet structure, 25 x 40 inches square and 42 inches high, with means exterior for the operation of each effect separately, or they can be operated in combinations. The Soundograph can be located either in the orchestra, pit or back of the screen as the exhibitor prefers. No expert operator is required, any one person is all that is needed to operate the Soundograph and produce perfect sound effects. A boy or some other employee of the theatre learns quickly to work the effects, thus relieving the exhibitor of the services of an expensive operator. It will put life and realism in your pictures and delight your audiences. It holds their interest and attention to the end of the reel and assures you of big box office receipts every day.

AN OPEN CONFESSION.

Springfield, Ohio, Feb. 7, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World, New York:

Dear Sir—I certainly must congratulate you on your spirit of fairness, and was very much pleased by your note to A. H. Sawyer's letter in your issue of February 12.

I am perfectly satisfied that the independent picture people are making good. I am filling my house by showing independent goods, and I am congratulated fifty times a day for the fine pictures I am getting. I am sorry now that I did not get wise before. What would associations do without a few leaders—and some are getting tiresome. I love to read unbiased news and like your independence.

Owner of "Fairyland."

With best wishes for your valued paper, I remain,

Yours truly,

W. O. ZIEGENFELDS,

WHAT ARE WE HERE FOR?

Prescott, Ariz., Feb. 10, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World, New York:

Dear Sir—I have read with much interest quite a number of articles in your valuable paper concerning the protection the exhibitors were supposed to receive for the $2.00 per week license fee charged by the Patents Company. To tell all of my experience, would require too much space, so I will only tell it briefly.

We all know that immediately after the formation of the Patents Company we were informed there would be levied $2.00 per week royalty, but the small exhibitor would not have to pay as much as the big fellow. According to the amount of business done was his license to be fixed.

I came to Prescott, Ariz., and opened a picture show, February 9, 1909, and, of course, I was informed by my exchange it would be necessary for me to send in my ten at once, which I did.

There was already one show in operation here at the time, and the proprietor showed me a letter, also a telegram, from his exchange, telling him to send in his ten by Saturday, February 13, 1909, or his service would stop. Well, he did not send in his ten, nor did his service stop, but, to my own knowledge, he received service up to the 14th of May, 1909, at which date he was still receiving service from a licensed exchange from whom I am now getting my service. I wrote lots of letters and even sent some one dollar telegrams to the Patents Company, stating the case fully, and all the satisfaction I got was promises to see that things would soon be straightened out.

I informed the Patents Company that after bitter experience, and that insomuch as I had complied with all their rules and found also that this city would not support two picture shows, they should see that my competitor did not receive licensed service. I even offered to submit my receipts and expenses to them to show that only one could make a go of it here. But no action was taken.

On May 15 we consolidated and closed one house, and did very well for a while, till another party jumped in, secured licensed films, ran three months and one day, lost $2,500 and closed up. Then, in about one month, another would-be manager came along with $300, ran nine days on licensed service, lost his $300 and skipped; and at the present time

I have the only picture theater in this city of 6,500. I know I am giving as good a show as can be found anywhere, and the idea of so many that two shows are better than one, is a delusion. And right here is a case where the Patents Company should step in and say: No more than one license in a town of less than 8,000.

If I had all the money back I have paid out in license, I could buy myself a mirror screen. I would not think of going to the independents for service, for I do not believe they can deliver the goods at the present time; but it's about time that the Patents Company were waking up along the lines of the protection we were promised and are paying $2.00 weekly for.

Yours truly,
CHAS. B. HOWARD.

TRADE MARK TRADE MARK

RELEASED FEBRUARY 28, 1910.

THE FINAL SETTLEMENT

A STORY OF A WOODSMAN'S LOVE AND WEAKNESS.

In this Biograph subject the awful result of drink is graphically shown. Two woodsmen, chums since boyhood, are in love with the same girl. Both are men of good character, and while Ruth cares for both as friends, her love is for Jim. John realizes her preference and withdraws. Jim, however, becomes addicted to drink and Ruth dismisses him. John now renews his suit and is successful. Jim sinks lower and becomes a renegade. Five years later the chums meet in the woods and the old enmity is revived. They quarrel and a duel is arranged. Jim, bent on robbery, breaks into a cabin, and is surprised to find it occupied by Ruth, whom he learns for the first time is married to John. As he leaves the awful thought of his meeting with John occurs to him. His love for Ruth being stronger than his thirst for revenge, and not to fight would brand him a coward, he meets John with a pistol loaded with blanks.

Approximate Length, 981 feet.

RELEASED MARCH 3, 1910.

THE NEWLYWEDS

A COMEDY OF ERRORS CORRECTED BY CUPID.

This is one of the most amusing comedies yet produced by the Biograph. A young man, jilted by his fiance, becomes a womanhater and joins the Anti-marriage Club. In another part of the town a young lady suffers like treatment by her fiance. She becomes a manhater. They, to forget their woes, have taken a little trip, but are now seen returning by the same train, and occupy the same seat, though unknown to each other. The young man on his way to the station has run into a child laden with grocery parcels, upsetting her burden, among which is a bag of rice. In a rage she throws a handful of the spilt rice at him, several grains of which stick to his clothing and hat. The passengers see this and assume it is a bridal couple. A member of the Anti-marriage Club is aboard and telegraphs ahead that Dick is a traitor and to arrange a reception. Such a reception. It is indescribable. That isn't the worst. The mock bride is the recipient of numerous wedding presents. Well the presents are not returned and Dick becomes part owner in them.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

THE NEWLYWEDS.—Two of the most delectable toys of Cupid are the womanhater and the manhater, and the anti-matrimonial clubs are to him roaring farces. He may play with you as a fisherman plays with a trout, but you are hooked eventually. Dick Harcourt was betrothed to little Alice Vance, and it looked as if the villagers would soon hear the tintinnabulation of wedding bells reverbrating through the flower-clothed vales of Southern California. The world is bright for Dick, the flowers take on a brighter hue, the birds sing sweeter and mental sunshine possesses him, when suddenly he is seized with an ominous convulsion. He asks himself, "Can this be indigestion?" No. Little does he know that it is a premonition of a prank of Cupid, for down the lane we see approaching Alice. To our question, "Alice, where art thou going, pretty maid?" "To give Dick the mitt, sir," she said. This she does, hurling poor Dick from the seventh heaven of delight into the depths of despair by giving back the engagement ring. In the glorious country of oranges he has picked a lemon. At that moment he becomes a womanhater, and in resentment joins the anti-marriage club. Meanwhile a similar tragedy is enacted at the home of Dora Dean, who is cruelly jilted by her sweetheart, Harry. Here, of course, we have the menmater. They are unknown to each other and by strange coincidence determine upon a little trip to induce forgetfulness. This has not the desired effect, and a homecoming is resolved upon. Ah! Cupid is still busy—that's the trouble, and by fortuity the bruised hearted couple board the same train. Dora, with her extreme loathing for men, refuses to share a seat with anyone. Dick is seen absentmindedly sauntering to the station and runs against a child laden with grocery parcels, spilling a bag of rice over the sidewalk. The child in anger throws a handful of the rice at Dick, grains of which repose on his hatbrim and shoulders. After paying the damage, he continues on to the railroad station, entering the coach wherein is seated disgruntled Dora. Hers is the only seat with but one occupant and although she has refused to share it with others, a handsome fellow like Dick has some weight. Another laugh for Cupid. Shortly after the train stops one of the passengers discovers the grains of rice on Dick's hatbrim: A bride and groom well! Congratulations are in order. Denials useless. On the train there happens to be a member of the anti marriage club, who telegraphs ahead the news that Dick is a traitor, requesting the club members to be at the station to give him a reception. Oh, such a reception. Headed by a tube band, the members carry signs reading, "Another Good Man Gone Wrong," "Marriage is a Good Thing, Nit!" etc. A carriage, to which is hitched a razor-back mule, is waiting. Into the carriage is forced Dora, and on the rail back of the mule is placed Dick. Through the town they parade towards Dora's home. Two things may be imagined—the consternation of the Dean family on the arrival of this bizarre caravan; also poor Dick's condition after his ride on this animated fence rail. This however, is not the worst of it, for when Dick calls to apologize for the scene in which he was an unwilling actor he finds that a wealth of wedding presents have been received by the groomless bride. He is blamed for it all and her intention is to throw them out, but Dick impresses her that such a course would be shameful—Cupid still busy. Well, the presents are not disturbed nor are the address cards reading, "To Mr. and Mrs. Richard Harcourt" changed. Cupid lands a knockout.

THE FINAL SETTLEMENT. The despicable habit of drink has directly wrecked more lives than any other weakness that flesh is heir to, and so fascinating are its effects that it is almost impossible to resist when once acquired. In this Biograph subject is shown a man who not only surrendered the prosperity and happiness of his future for it, but indirectly cut short that future. Jim and John, two woodsmen, are rivals for the hand of Ruth. John is an honest, unobtrusive fellow, and lets Jim lead in their suit, hence, Jim and Ruth are betrothed. Ruth truly loves Jim, having assumed that John's little attentions were merely expressions of friendship, so John retires. After the betrothal Jim and Ruth are more in each other's company and consequently she learns his true character. She is amazed to find that he is a slave to drink, and realizing her hopes of future happiness with him in vain, she dismisses him. She is crushed beyond measure, but is thankful that she escaped before too late. John learning of the broken engagement, renews his suit and is accepted by Ruth, for she now sees the difference in the two natures. They are married, and we find them five years later happy in their little cabin, a child having blessed their union. Off John goes for his work in the woods felling timber. Jim has meanwhile become in a measure a renegade. He whiles his time hunting, looting and in fact, anything that will bring him drink to satisfy his insatiable thirst. He does not know what became of Ruth, nor does he seem to care. It is lunch time in the lumber camp when Jim staggers along to come face to face with John. John good naturedly offers Jim a share of his lunch. This Jim refuses and, furthermore, picks a quarrel with John, for the meeting has revived the old enmity. Friends interpose, but a challenge to fight later is passed, the meeting to take place the same evening. Jim, appreciating his talent as a sure shot, doesn't worry, but goes along with his friend to see where he can raise money for drink. They come to a cabin and break in, not knowing nor caring who the occupant is. You may imagine his amazement at finding himself in the presence of Ruth, whom he learns for the first time is married to John. He leaves the cabin and at first is elated at the extent of the revenge he is about to wreak, but later he realizes what disaster it would work for poor Ruth and her little one. These thoughts arouse his better self, so long benumbed by drink, and he resolves to refuse to fight, for his love for her is stronger than his thirst for revenge. But no. That would not do. To refuse to fight would mean to be driven from the woods as a coward. He must make a sacrifice. Taking the shells from his gun he extracts the bullets, so he meets John on the field of honor with a weapon charged with blank cartridges.

RANSON'S FOLLY. Lieut. Ranson has drifted into the American Army, not from patriotism nor from necessity, but entirely from the spirit of adventure. After many exciting episodes he finds himself quietly stationed in a frontier fort; things are far too sedate to suit his "devil-may-care" nature. So one evening, midst falling in love with the post trader's daughter and listening to the stories of college pranks by the West Point officers, his eyes chance to fall upon the sign posted: "Reward! $500 for the capture dead or alive of 'Red Rider,' the Stage-Coach Robber!" Ranson laughingly jests that holding up a stage-coach is a very simple matter, and to prove the fact he lays a wager that upon this very night he himself will hold up the incoming stage with only a pair of shears as a weapon. Taking an oilskin coat to hide his uniform and a red handkerchief to cover his face, he starts on his lark, as he terms it. Scarcely has he gone before orders are received that Paymaster Patten will be aboard the coach, and a detachment of cavalry is to meet him and escort him in. Now the folly of Ranson takes a serious turn. There is a vast difference between holding up a stage coach and one with a Government paymaster aboard who always shoots to kill. The officers go forth to do their duty regardless of consequences, but all this has been overheard by the post trader himself, who is no other than the real "Red Rider," the stage-coach robber. He sees his chance and, disguising himself identically the same as Ranson, starts out on his mission. Fate changes things around; the paymaster misses the stage coach and follows shortly after in a private carriage.

Lieut. Ranson carries out his threat, reaches the stage-coach first, holds it up with a pair of shears and is flirting with the ladies, when he is interrupted by the arrival of the detachment of cavalry. Ranson has succeeded in making his escape unidentified, when suddenly the cavalry hear firing down the road. They arrive just in time to find an overturned carriage, the driver dead and Paymaster Patten defending himself behind the vehicle. The robber is wounded in the hand, but escapes. That night Lieut. Ranson comes gallantly swinging into the officers' quarters, with a gleam of mirth sparkling in his eyes. A toast is proposed, but suddenly interrupted by the entrance of a detachment of soldiers and the sharp order "You are under arrest, Lieut. Ranson, charged with stopping the stage-coach, holding up Paymaster Patten and killing the driver." Ranson is dumbfounded when in a few minutes he finds himself under guard in his own quarters, a prisoner.

Needless to say that by chance it is discovered that two black-coated figures rode forth in the moonlight that night. And when "Red Rider," otherwise the post trader, finds that his daughter is in love with Ranson, the man whom he is trying to condemn, and realizes that his daughter's happiness lies in Ranson's vindication, he reveals the truth to Ranson. In the midst of the exciting scene the old post trader steals from the room. A pistol shot rings out and a tiny curl of smoke steals from above the curtain of the door. Then a moment later the tragedy of "Ranson's Folly" is revealed.

THE ELEVENTH HOUR.—To make clear what has occurred before "The Eleventh Hour," it is necessary to go back five years when we are shown a fond but stern father learning the sad truth that his son is not only a drunkard but that, while under the influence of drink, he has so forgotten his honor as to deem it no disgrace to rob his father's safe. The young man rebels against his father's stern words of reproach and, filled with hot anger, raises his cane to deal his father a blow. This is more than the parental love is willing to stand, and the boy is turned out of the house. Five years pass by, and the father has become the Governor of the State. One morning, while seated at his desk in his private office, the following message is handed him from the warden of the penitentiary:

"I have just discovered that the young man, who is to be hanged at 11 o'clock for murder, has been identified by marks on his clothes, as your son. What shall I do?"

This is an awful blow to the Governor, and all at once the love of the father springs into his heart. He writes out a pardon, but ere the secretary has reached the door, the man slinks away and only the Governor, the representative of the law, remains. He tears up the pardon and writes, "Let the law take its course." The secretary pleads with him, but he will not listen. What right has he to stop the wheels of justice? His son is guilty and the law says he shall be hanged; and he, the Governor, must uphold the law. The message is sent. Left alone, all the tender chords of a father's love for his boy are being torn asunder. In his mind he sees himself a young man, his arms around the young mother of his boy as they stand smiling down at the tiny crib before them. If he could but shut out the sight and silence the clicking of the clock, which is slowly but surely bringing his boy to the moment of that death from which he has refused to raise a hand to save him!

The Governor starts for the door, but suddenly before him stands the vision of Justice. The scales are balanced, and the sword is in her hand. The struggle is too great—he is afraid of his own weakness. He locks the door and hurls the key far out of the window. Now he is safe with his duty. Slowly the hands of the clock creep toward that awful "Eleventh Hour." Now he can see the prison wall, the reporters and doctors standing before that little iron door. It opens, and his boy comes forth. How young he is, and death but a few moments away! He sees the boy stagger, shrinking from the awful future. At last the agony is too great and the Governor falls fainting on the table.

Outside a young man appears with a grip in his hand. "May I see the Governor? I am his son." The secretary cannot believe it possible until a messenger rushes in from the penitentiary with the following message:

"Clothes found on condemned prisoner were discovered to have been stolen. He is not your son. I humbly beg your excellency's pardon. R. P. Holmes, Penitentiary Warden."

A few moments later and the door is smashed in, and what an awakening of great joy when the Governor finds his boy, now leading an upright life, clasped in his arms.

THE MAN UNDER THE BED.—A Western inventor, deeply absorbed in his book, wanders into an old maid's room by mistake, takes off his shoes, puts on his slippers and starts to make himself at home. He suddenly discovers her hat and coat on the door, snatches up his belongings and beats a hasty retreat, leaving the stub of his cigar on the stand and his shoes under the edge of the bed in such a position that they look suspiciously as if some one's feet were sticking out. Of course, when the old maid enters the room she detects the odor of cigar smoke, and her apprehensions are immediately aroused. Looking hastily about the room she discovers what she thinks is "a horrid man," and runs shrieking through the corridorss, alarming the entire house. The timid young clerk and chambermaids, responding to her frantic calls, arm themselves with a revolver, brooms, etc., and attempt to dislodge the intruder, maintaining a respectful distance at all times from the man (?) under the bed. How the owner of the shoes comes in at the opportune moment, how he attempts to escape from the threatening weapons of his now almost-heroic captors, how he makes an impression on the old maid's heart and how she calms his perturbation with the butt of his cigar to the amazement of the clerk and chambermaids are better told in the film itself than in words, which do not suggest the uproarious fun of the story.

RAGS, OLD IRON!—Two youngsters, Issy and his brother, Willie, are passing a moving picture theater when they are attracted by the loud-voiced "barker" and the picture posters in the lobby. But they have no money, and after loitering about for awhile they are chased away by the "barker."

Issy suggests that they hunt up a bunch of rags or old iron and wait for the junkman. So they hie them off to the cellar of their house and emerge shortly with a large bag with a few rags. There are not enough rags, apparently, and Issy suggests that Willie get in the bag to make up the weight. Willie hesitates for a moment, but finally consents to be sold and crawls into the bag.

Finally the ragman comes driving up the alley and Issy hails him. The ragman weighs the bundle, throws it upon the wagon and counts the change. Then he mounts his seat and starts to drive away.

Suddenly the bag begins bouncing about on top of the wagon as Willie endeavors to get out. The ragman looks around suspiciously at the bag and at Issy who is following along behind. But nothing occurs until the ragman clambers off his wagon to weigh up a bundle of rags for a neighbor lady.

The bag rolls off and begins rolling under the wagon, the ragman after it. Finally the ragman is caught in his scales and Issy starts the horse, dragging the frantic ragman down the alley.

Preferred for Edison production by the author, Richard Harding Davis. Ranson's arrest and vindication by the suicide of the outlaw. An absorbing story of a Western military post, splendidly acted and staged. The big film of the year.

AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR

An intensely dramatic story of a father's love, a son's ingratitude and crime, and a mistaken identity which forced the father to apparently condemn his own son to death by refusing, as Governor of the State, to reprieve his sentence. THE MASTERMARK OF PICTUREDOM

A few minutes later the boys meet and enter the picture house. Here they enjoy the antics of two "vaudevillains" and laugh at the funny pictures which are thrown on the screen. This little comedy within a comedy is a humorous one and a decided novelty.

Finally the boys are put out when they start a "rough house" and meet up with the ragman again. A lively chase follows but they elude the ragman and go home, tired but happy.

THE EGG TRUST.—We will say that the time of the story is a number of years hence. The egg dealers have formed themselves into a powerful combine, controlling every egg laid on earth. They are in a position to set whatever price they desire on eggs and of course the price has soared to the very topnotch in the food products.

The first scene shows a few farmers gathering eggs. The scene is the interior of a hen house. But the real producers of our many palatable omelets do not seem to have received their just dues, as it is a very common, ordinary sort of a hen house and the hens are doing business in the same old-fashioned way. But it is the egg trust, the big combine, who are reaping the benefits.

The next scene shows a scene in a city street. Three big drayage wagons, labeled "Eggs" and loaded down with cases of the delectable hen fruit, are seen moving slowly down the street guarded by United States soldiers.

At the storage house another company of soldiers are on hand as the eggs are removed from the wagon and carefully carried into the storage house. A crowd has gathered to watch this interesting sight. Occasionally some one sees an egg and the crowd becomes greatly excited.

In the storage house, employees of the trust are seen candling the eggs. Egg cases are stacked up about them, all labeled with the dates when the eggs were gathered. Some date back as far as 1492. Occasionally, when an egg is placed too close to the candle, it explodes.

We are next shown the interior of a restaurant. A German waiter is hustling about. On the walls signs read: "Ham and Eggs, $3.25," and "Ham and Eggplant, $.25." A typical Westerner enters, seats himself at a table and orders ham and eggs. The waiter is electrified. He questions the man again. "Yes, yes," says the stranger, "ham and eggs!"

"Mein Gott!" says the German, "the first order in two years!" And he goes to the safe to remove three eggs to fill the gentleman's order.

We are next shown the interior of a luxurious banquet hall, in the home of the president of the trust. The assembled guests rise to toast "The Hen bless her." When the feast is through with, the president conducts his guests to a private room, a sort of sanctuary, where there is an enormous egg, on which is perched a white chicken. On the base of the marble pedestal is wrought "O, Yea Chicken!"

The president and his guests enter. The scene is impressive. All gather around and lowering their heads, worship for a moment, and quietly withdraw.

THE RANGER AND THE GIRL. The Ranger is a member of the famous band of Texans whose exploits have made them the equals of the Canadian Northwest Mounted Police. The girl is the daughter of a smuggler whose livelihood is gained by smuggling laces and other goods across the Rio Grande. Esmeralda loses her scarf, which catches upon a branch projecting over the roadway and when she realizes her loss and returns to search for it, she finds it in the possession of Captain "Bud" Carver, of the Rangers. Carver is smitten with her charms and accompanies her to her home. While seeking a drink his hat blows down the well into which the laces have been lowered and the efforts made to dissuade him from recovering the headgear rouse his suspicions. He later returns to verify his theories and is captured by the smugglers who carry him off to kill him in a more deserted spot. Esmeralda alarms his fellows in the troop and they ride to his rescue. Carver is threatened by one of the smugglers, who has instructions to kill him should the Rangers attack, and Esmeralda knows that her father means his threat. As the only way of saving her lover she wounds the smuggler and her father but aids them to escape, offering herself as hostage to Carver, who gladly accepts the proffer.

THE MILLIONAIRE'S ADVENTURE.—Mary Hennings, the pretty daughter of a prosperous but quick tempered farmer, is driven to leave home by her father's brutality. She cuts off her curls and dons a suit of her brother's clothes. She takes to the road and when some brakemen attack her for stealing a ride a tramp comes to her rescue. They cast their lots together and the tramp protects her from many of the hardships of the road. They enter a tavern to warm themselves and are about to be put out when the tramp spies a fiddle on the wall and offers to play in return for a meal. The inkeeper is so well pleased with his playing and Mary's singing that he gives them the instrument. With this they find their progress easier and when the tramp notes the date on a bulletin board and declares that he must be back east in two days Mary helps him earn the money for the railroad trip. It develops that the tramp is John West, a millionaire, who has made a bet that he could travel for a month without funds. West takes his little comrade to his home where she is forced to disclose the secret of her sex. West turns her over to the housekeeper, who provides her with one of her own daughter's pretty party frocks. West falls in love with Mary. They are married and the new Mrs. West takes her husband to visit her mother, where the little runaway is received with open arms.

PATHE FRERES.

OUCHARD, THE MERCHANT. "Ouchard, the Merchant," is a strong dramatic piece played by the new Russian stock company of the leading actors from Moscow, under the direction of the stage manager from the theater at Vincennes. The scenes were photographed in Moscow and the picture play is adapted from an old folk-song. Seldom has there been a more intensely interesting film, and the spectators' interest never flags from beginning to end. The film is colored with exceptional care and beauty.

Marcha, a beautiful peasant girl, is the daughter of a disreputable old drunkard whose sole object in life seems to be to get enough to drink. In the first scene we see Marcha begging her mother to take her to the village fair, and after considerable entreaty the old woman consents and accompanied by her husband and daughter she leads the way to the fair grounds. Here we see the peasant girls and the stalwart sons of Russia dancing the quaint country dances and Marcha dances the best and seems to take the greatest delight in the rhythmic motions. She embodies all the grace and beauty of perfect youth in her movements. Soon there comes an interruption. A wagon is seen approaching and word is passed from mouth to mouth that Ouchard, the wealthy merchant, is coming to show his wares. Selling, however, in such surroundings soon tires Ouchard, who would rather make love, dance and drink than work, and so many pretty girls entice him away from his goods into the circle of the dance. Seeing Marcha, the merchant tries to embrace her, but is repulsed by the old mother to whom the honor of the family is still dear. The offer of money has no effect upon the old woman but to bring a look of scorn to her wrinkled face. Marcha's father, however, who has drunk all the wine for which he can pay and is in search of more money to buy still more wine, overhears the offer of money for the mere relaxation of parental vigilance and he strikes a bargain with Ouchard in which his daughter is the chattel. Frightened, the simple villagers run away and soon poor Marcha is left alone with this terrible man who tries again and again to get her to drink enough of the native wine to stupefy her, but she resists until, having led her protesting to his hut, he makes her drink the insidious liquor by means of threats. In a moment the wine has its effect. The senses are dulled and the caresses of Ouchard are less abhorrent indeed almost welcome.

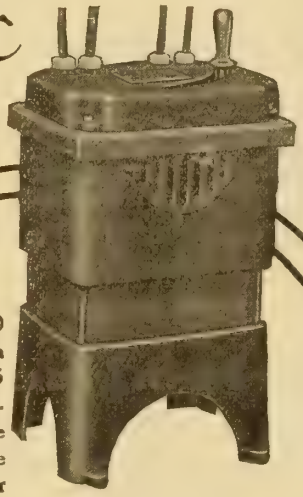
In the meantime Marcha's father has spent all he had in wine and is thrown out of the tavern where he has at last become unwelcome because he has no more money, and has wandered home. His wife is sitting alone waiting in forlorn despair the return of her beautiful daughter. The father falls in a drunken stupor on the floor of the rude but ornate hut and thus the night is passed.

In the next scene we see Marcha with her head bowed on her arms, stupefied by the wine she has taken. Her long black hair hangs in two lustrous braids across her shoulders and Ouchard, who realized its value, steals behind her and feigning a caress, cuts her hair off short. In Russia it is considered a disgrace for a young woman to have short hair, and so the poor girl starts to her feet in dismay, but Ouchard, who now has what he wants, thrusts the unhappy girl out into the road. Homeward the miserable girl drags her leaden feet and after stumbling across the prostrate body of her drunken and oblivious father, she scatters the few pieces of money Ouchard has given her over the floor and casting herself at her mother's feet sobs out the story of her experience. The patient mother caresses the bowed head, but nothing can assuage poor Marcha's grief, for with her as with us "a woman's crowning glory is her hair."

THE GUNBYS' SOJOURN IN THE COUNTRY.—The Gunbys are enjoying their day in the country, when Mrs. Gunby, on seeing a beautiful cool-looking little brook, decides to take a swim: whereupon some mischievous lads steal her clothes, and bedeck with same a horse which they find quietly grazing in a nearby field. When they have the animal dressed up to their liking they let him out of the field, and he goes galloping down the village street, causing a regular stampede among the villagers. The substantial-looking owner of the stolen garments, cutting a no less ridiculous figure in her bathing suit as she hurries wildly after the fast disappearing animal, only adds to the excitement and fun. When the terrified animal finally seeks his stable, his bewildered owner, on seeing the fat panting woman in her ridiculous bathing suit hastening after him, rushes to the door and chases her off with his broom.

COMPENSARC

This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills



Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

DOCTOR'S SACRIFICE.—Dr. Kramer is sitting one evening in his comfortable home, in conversation with his wife, when the nurse appears with his two children to let them say good-night before going to bed. The doctor is struck by the appearance of the boy, who looks very ill, and he examines him carefully. Before he has finished the examination, a man arrives with a message that a poor workman's child is very ill and requires the doctor's services. The doctor hesitates about leaving his own boy, but it is his duty to go, and he follows the messenger from the house. He arrives at the workman's home, attends to the child until he is out of danger, and then hurries back to his own boy. During his absence, however, his son grows steadily worse, and the mother at last, in desperation, sends for another doctor. This doctor has less experience than Dr. Kramer and is unable to do anything for the child, who dies before the father arrives home. This is the heaviest blow that could strike Dr. Kramer, and he sinks into deep melancholy, talking to nobody. Even his little girl cannot console him for the loss of his boy. He walks around as though he were in a dream, and one day while sitting in the park, the workman whose child he had attended sees him, and approaches to thank him again for saving the life of his little boy. But the doctor refuses to accept his thanks, for in his grief he unjustly blames the workman for the loss of his son. Greatly surprised, the workman is about to withdraw, when he sees the little daughter of the doctor sitting on the grass, innocently playing with a poisonous snake. He grasps the snake, but before he can kill it, it has its poisonous fangs in his hand. As the doctor sees this he suddenly wakes up from his stupor, and he realizes that there is not a minute to be lost in performing an operation on the man, to save his life. All the old interest in his work returns, and he saves the workman's life through a quick operation. The doctor after this is a very different man, and through his gratitude to the poor workman for saving his daughter's life the two families become very good friends.

ECLAIR.

ASPIRANTS TO THE HAND OF HELEN.—Helen is very much distressed. A most embarrassing state of affairs exists. Three suitors are clamoring for her hand, and every day is made discordant by the quarreling and envious strivings of these three pretenders. Would that some kind fairy would whisper in Helen's pink-shell ear, the kindly advice her heart desires. But, no! And, therefore, she must herself devise a plan for choosing aright. At last, with her father's aid, she hits upon an admirable scheme she will choose the man who proves himself to be the most efficient housekeeper! Accordingly, the lovers are requested to present themselves upon the appointed day; aprons, brooms, feather dusters, etc., are provided, and the test begins. The competition is rather an exciting one, as one of the suitors is extremely near sighted, and his awkwardness is beyond defining. Many and embarrassing, as well as humorous, are the troubles which beset these poor aspirants to the throne of one young and very beautiful maiden's heart, in their mad endeavor to prove themselves worthy. At last, more out of sympathy for the furniture, etc., the gentle Helen gives her hand to the young man who went most gracefully about his appointed task, and there is great rejoicing in the home of Helen, in which, we are very much afraid, the two rejected gentlemen do not participate.

THE CAGE.—Returning victorious from one of his glorious cruises, the renowned Morgan meets a young lady, with whom he falls violently in love, and is fortunate enough, also, to win the affection of the object of his devotion. However, a great obstacle arises the girl's guardian will not hear of the union of his ward with the celebrated chief of the buccaneers. The young lady decides, ultimately, to disregard the wishes of her guardian and to determine her future happiness for herself, and, therefore, though unable to see her lover, she sets to work by means of correspondence to lay plans for their elopement. Unfortunately, however, for the plot, one of the letters falls into the hands of the enraged guardian, who immediately orders the capture by his servants of the venturesome pirate, and lover of his ward. The servants, therefore lie in wait for the chief, seize him, and drag him before their master, who has him thrown behind bars. When the young lady hears what has occurred, she is greatly distressed, and gives herself over to despair. Her maid, who has been devoted to her mistress since childhood, is so unhappy at her dear lady's trouble that she decides at all costs to endeavor to restore her to happiness. The maid, therefore, makes her way to the den of the pirate friends of Morgan and discloses to them all she knows of the capture of their chief, and also explains how they may make their way to the place of imprisonment and release their captain. A unique scheme is devised by which the friends of Morgan make their way, disguised, into the premises of the old guardian, and, after drugging him, deliver the captive, who immediately flees with his lady love, without stopping to enjoy the rage of the old gentleman when he awakes.

THE COWBOY AND THE SCHOOL-MARM.—Jess Wilson, a young and pretty school teacher of the "Golden West," is just leaving the little school house in which she teaches, when Joe Blackburn, a man with a "bad reputation," meets her and forces his attentions upon her, finally proposing marriage. Jess is insulted and orders him away. Blackburn, angry and vindictive, swears he will get her yet. A few nights later, Jim Brady, a cowboy, who is courting Jess, proposes marriage and is accepted. As Jim is slipping an engagement ring gon Jess' finger, Blackburn appears and again makes his threat, saying, "You haven't got her yet and you never will." Young Deer, an Indian, and his squaw, Red Wing, are trying to sell some beadwork, when Blackburn, who has been drinking very hard and is in a fighting mood, attacks both of them. Jim Brady, seeing the plight of the Indians, comes to their aid and drives off Blackburn, who is now more determined than ever to get revenge. The next day, as Jess is riding along the road on her way home from school, Blackburn and his pals surround and force her to ride ahead of them at the point of a revolver. Young Deer and Red Wing, who have pitched their camp along the side of the road for the night, see the whole occurrence. Young Deer, perceiving the situation, tells Red Wing to follow Blackburn and his pals, instructing her to drop some of the beads at every turning point along the trail, while he goes to warn Jim of Jess' danger. Red Wing, who follows the trail, dropping the beads as she goes along, falls exhausted, just as Young Deer and Jim overtake her and pick up the trail, which proves to be long and hazardous, but finally ending after a hard gun fight between Blackburn and Jim, who makes a daring rescue, saving Jess from death at the hands of Blackburn.

THE THIRD DEGREE.—John Nolan is a hard-working, honest man, who has been thrown out of employment, and, from causes over which he has no control, finds it extremely difficult to find work. His wife and child are reduced to the point of starvation, when John happens to think of an old friend and decides to call on him for work. Cold, hunger and want have so worked on the overwrought nerves of the wife that she falls into a sleep, but her rest is broken by horrible dreams. She dreams that her husband has gone to the home of his friend with the intent to rob him. A burglar has just entered the house for the same purpose. A struggle ensues between the old man and the burglar, in which the old man is choked almost into insensibility. Just as he recovers, John enters the room, and, mistaking him for the person who had assaulted him, the old man springs on John with all the fury of a man defending his possessions. In the struggle the old man is thrown near the por-

The Treachery of the Pequots

Length 610 Feet

The Court Jester

Length 295 Feet

This KALEM reel for Wednesday, March 2, we regard as one of the strongest attractions ever offered to moving picture theatres—a thrilling Indian production of great historic interest, and a novel and most amusing comedy. In "The Court Jester" we introduce again the wonderfully clever dwarf who made such a hit in "The Little Old Men of the Woods" and his work in the picture is really immense. We have only to whisper that he is at present playing a star part in the biggest of all the big New York theatrical productions, to give you an idea of his calibre. His managers refuse to allow us to use his name.

The Girl Thief

Issue of March 4. Length 950 Feet

"THE GIRL THIEF" is a tremendously strong romance by our Southern Stock Company, the story of a thief's reformation through the influence of a clergyman's love.

New York City used one of those much talked about current rectifiers which are supposed to improve the light on the screen by changing the alternating current into direct for the moving picture arc lamp

Automatic Electric Economizer, and the results are claimed to be better and the saving is certainly 50 per cent. more.

I build the "HALLBERG" for direct, as well as alternating current, for any voltage or cycles to control moving picture and stereopticon lamps, spot and search lights, and guarantee a saving of from 50 to 90 per cent., depending upon the kind of current.

I make allowance for your old rheostat or current saver in trade for the "HALLBERG"

HAVE YOU SEEN THE BIG STUDEBAKER SIGN, at 48th Street & Broadway?

WELL, they were using about 400—4 c.p. lamps and it cost them about 80 cents per hour to operate the sign. Now, this sign is controlled by the "HALLBERG" Economizer and it cost them only 20 cents per hour. You are using a lot of incandescent lamps—Why don't you let me save from 60 to 75 per cent. on your bill.

OLD MAMMA TEN PERCENT HAS THE PIP

Now that Old Mamma Ten Percent is gradually shuffling off this mortal coil, a new scheme is being rigged up to take her place. As soon as I find out what it is I will expose it. Old mamma has been so thoroughly exposed that she is almost useless. Exhibitors are flatly refusing to pay a ten per cent. penalty for the doubtful privilege of switching their trade from one licensed exchange to another. Rear up on your hind legs next time anyone tries to penalize you, and you'll be gratified, and astounded and surprised, and tickled to see how quickly the exchange man will back water. Better still, assert your independence and let me give you an independent service that will set you crazy with delight. Big as my business was a year ago, it is almost twice as big now, and it's due to the excellent films the independent manufacturers are turning out. I've received all kinds of letters from exhibitors telling me their business has increased from thirty to sixty per cent. since they became independent. There must be a powerful reason for all this. Why the deuce don't you TRY IT OUT FOR, SAY A WEEK, and see what's doing? You're on your back. Roll over! Wake up! Dare me to increase your business!

We Nail a Lie

The blackest and at the same time the silliest lie yet circulated by enemies of the "Imp" was the story foisted on the public of St. Louis last week to the effect that Miss Lawrence (the "Imp" girl, formerly known as the "Biograph" girl) had been killed by a street car. It was a black lie because so cowardly. It was a silly lie because so easily disproved. Miss Lawrence was not even in a street-car accident, is in the best of health, will continue to appear in "Imp" films, and very shortly some of the best work in her career is to be released. We now announce our next films:

"The Broken Bath"

(Released March 14th. Length 950 feet.)

A powerful melodrama dealing with a young chap, his sweetheart and a secret society. There's action from the first foot of film and it keeps you five million miles up in the air until the happy finale. This is the kind of film dozens of our customs have been begging us to produce. Watch for it.

"The Time-Lock Safe"

(Released March 17th. Length 960 feet.)

A drama that suddenly and unexpectedly turns into a farce. If your little child were locked in a safe and you paid a professional safe-blower a stack of money to get him out, and then found the kid safely ensconced in the towel basket and not in the safe at all, would you be glad or would you be sore? Imagine what a corking good picture can be worked up on this plot.

If you never do another thing in your life, get "Mother Love" (released March 7th). It's our film d'pipperino!

This is the kind of picture that your audiences will enjoy from start to finish and tell their neighbors to see.

SHE IS DEAD!!!

Murdered in Ice Cold Bludddd by Carl Laemmle.

—She's dead!
—Old Mamma Ten Percent is dead!
—Deadernell!
—Get out the crepe! Sound the doleful drums of death. Boom! Let the mournful trombone croon its agonizing dirge. Oom-pah! Oom-pah! Toll the bells. Ding-a-ling!
—For she's dead!
—No more will Old Mamma Ten Percent dance jigs of joy on the flattened pocketbook of Mr. Exhibitor.
—For she's deadernell! She died Monday, February 28th.
—Old Mamma Ten Percent was a good friend of certain Licensed Exchanges. She made it impossible for an exhibitor to switch his business from one to another of them without paying a penalty of ten percent.
—I published the story week after week, hammering it into the exhibitors until they took action and demanded that the penalty be abolished.
—While Old Mamma Ten Percent was a creature of certain Licensed Exchanges, yet unintentionally she did a good turn for the Independent cause. She opened the eyes of many an exhibitor to the fact that he was being used for an easy mark.
—At first there were many exhibitors who didn't want to believe that they were being milked. But they tested the penalty game themselves and found that it was only too true!
—Finally, after several weeks they brought such a pressure to bear upon certain Licensed Exchanges that the latter did not dare to continue their ridiculous conspiracy.
—This only goes to show what a TREMENDOUS POWER lies in the hands of the exhibitors if they will only USE IT.
—I could have exposed the ten percent thing till I was black in the face but it would have been utterly useless without action on the part of the exhibitors.
—Acting in concert the exhibitors can bring about any reform they want and there is no honest exchange, licensed or independent, that will not accede to any reasonable and honest demand.
—The exhibitors are simply repaying me for the fight I have made for the independent cause. I HAVE MORE BUSINESS NOW THAN EVER IN MY MOVING PICTURE CAREER and I am giving the best films and the best service I ever saw or heard of.
—Owing to the enormous increase of business I have been compelled to increase my buying to a greater extent than I ever dreamed of. But I am only too glad to buy BECAUSE THE INDEPENDENT FILMS NOW BEING PRODUCED ARE SIMPLY MAGNIFICENT.
—It was on account of the stampede of exhibitors toward independence that the Licensed Exchanges were compelled to drop Old Mamma Ten PERCENT. Put that in your cob and puff at it a bit.

IMPORTANT SERIES OF ARTICLES.

There is no more fascinating department of moving picture work, or projection work generally, than the optical side: that is to say, the relationship or interrelationship of light, picture, condensor, lens and screen—the optical system, in fact. Yet there is also no branch of the work which is so little understood. As to the ordinary operator, his lack of knowledge is so considerable that one despairs of implanting in his mind even the most rudimentary idea of what optics are.

We first gave attention to the optics of projection a good many years ago. Indeed, one of us, whose name is on this page, edited a London publication called the Lantern Record, in which it was our business to expound the principles of optical projection. We propose doing this again, commencing next week. We shall go over, in simple language, in a series of short chapters, the optical principles that apply to the moving picture projector, explaining in clear and simple language what it is desirable the operator should know in theory. An operator with good theoretical knowledge of projection optics can do much towards making his pictures successful. The fact that he rarely has this theoretical knowledge is probably the reason why there is such a general complaint as to the bad and inefficient manner in which moving pictures are shown all over the country.

Giving Credit Where Credit is Due.

Is the moving picture public interested in the personalities of the writers of film scenarios? This question is suggested to us by a letter from a correspondent, who urges that the authors' names should be given on the screen. He seems to think that the authors should receive credit. The point he raises is an interesting one and is worth discussing.

Two facts stand out with remarkable clearness in the last year's history of the moving picture. One is that the public is unmistakably interested in the personalities of the chief performers. This interest is growing. We ourselves only this last week stopped, quite unconsciously, outside of a well-known moving picture theater in New York City and looked at the pictures of a group of actors and actresses, and after we admired the pictures we discovered that we were looking at portraits of the Kalem Company's stock company. Yet before that we seemed to be simply conscious that we were looking, as all of us do at times, at pictures of ordinary actors and actresses outside an ordinary theater.

This is a healthy sign of the times and shows that the moving picture is progressing in dignity and esteem. It is another sign that public interest in the moving picture is on the increase and not on the decrease. Clearly, then, the personalities of the performers interest the public, and possibly the personalities of the writers of the stories. Of this, however, we are not quite sure. It is true that the Edison Company, Selig, and other manufacturers are publishing the names of their noted authors, but we are without evidence of the effect of this upon the public. No doubt the exchanges and the exhibitors are influenced. Whether the public is, is another matter. The personal equation of the author has hardly yet manifested itself in the moving picture. A Fitch play, a Pinero play can be identified by one glance at the book of the words What is there about a moving picture play by such men to distinguish it from a play by an unknown author? Does the public really care, then, for the authors of moving picture stories when there seems to be no means of identifying them or labeling them with a distinctive quality? This is a point on which we would like to have the opinion of some of our readers. Do they find their audiences attracted by a moving picture story to which the name of a well-known author is attached? It would be interesting to have some data on this point.

When answering the correspondent who wrote us on this subject, we said that we were rather curious to know who the authors of certain stories were that we admired during the past year. These stories struck us as extremely fresh and dramatic, and so they struck the public. We could give quite a list of them, though, perhaps, no useful purpose would be served. After all, the life of a film is very brief. It is not advertised like a play, so perhaps the point at present is not very material.

There is one aspect of the mattter that has not received attention: and it is this, that at present no outside reputation has been made by scenario writers. The well-known writers who are supplying some manufacturers made their reputations as novelists and dramatists. They have come from the outside. Inside, there does not appear to be any scenario writer who is making name and fame so that his work is extensively requested. Maybe, however, the future has something in store for us in this respect.

Agitation and Alarm.

The agitator and the alarmist are as busy as ever in the moving picture field. Some of the articles that have recently appeared from the pens of these people amuse by their very absurdity. Indeed, they point to a state of things in the moving picture industry almost inconceivably grotesque. A heavily capitalized company was recently registered. Thereupon the alarmist and the agitator began to draw and publish conclusions; that the whole of the moving picture industry of the United States is to be gobbled up by a set of plutocrats whose one object is the monopoly of the business. More ridiculous nonsense was never put into print. We have been amused to read it, but, at least, in one direction, we have not been surprised, for agitation and alarm is the sole stock in trade and the sole reason to be of the foolish individual who lives by scenting danger and disaster when none exist.

We discussed this printed rubbish with regard to the General Film Company with one of the most prominent film renters in the United States the other day. This man, who is on the licensed side of the business, smiled. His deliberate opinion was that there would probably be a diminution in the number of renters, as he very cogently pointed out that there were too many in the business, and that those that were in it were not making anything like the amount of money they had a right to look for from the volume of business they were doing. But as to the possibility or even the probability of a monopoly of the exchange business by any one company, he was equally derisive. He laughed outright and said that the exhibitors of the country would certainly not stand for that.

The exhibitor, in fact, is a factor in the business who is constantly gaining strength, especially where he is lucky enough or clever enough to ward off local competition. As we have pointed out over and over again, he is the vital factor in the moving picture business in the United States to-day. He picks and he chooses; he cuts prices and bargains: he makes and breaks the reputations of the exchanges and manufacturers; indeed, to all intents and purposes, he has all possible freedom and independence in the exercise of his business. In this condition of affairs, therefore, it is a little difficult to see what possible ground there can be for the agitation and alarm which we see is trickling through some newspapers of inferior standard.

This bogey of monopoly is a favorite device of the agitator and the alarmist. We, who write this, well remember how in England a few years ago in another industry a cry of monopoly was raised where none was attempted or contemplated, by a huge company merely anxious to get its goods on the market in a legitimate way and to insist upon certain conditions of sale. The alarmist and the agitator saw their way of making newspaper capital of the threatened terror and meretricious agitation was engineered. The alarmist and the agitator got a few more advertisements, sold a few more copies of their papers and so achieved their ends.

That is just what the alarmist and the agitator are doing in the moving picture field to-day. We are not going to give away any free advertisements, but there are three American publications touching on the moving picture in a perfunctory, illiterate and ill-informed manner, which at this moment are deliberately misleading their readers with needless agitation and alarm. The freedom of the exhibitor is no more threatened to-day than it was twelve months ago; on the contrary, he is in a far better and stronger position all the way round. Nor is the reputable exchange man any the worse; nor are the Independent manufacturers who are not interfering with other people's rights. All the alarm and the agitation that is printed in newspapers to which we refer arises simply from the desire to create a false impression—the false impression that a secret body of American business men are planning to corral the moving picture industry of the United States. Not a bit of it. We thought we had done away with writing this kind of article a long time ago, but apparently it is necessary to put these highly imaginative agitators and alarmists in their proper place, and their proper place is the society of the demented. In other words they are very stupid people to whose writings no importance whatsoever should be attached. The moving picture industry to-day is stronger than ever it was. It will increase in strength and make money for all concerned in it and it will prosper in the inverse ratio of what these alarmists and agitators think it will. In other words, as we pointed out weeks ago, "it will go on."

"Recruiting Stations of Vice."

A Libel on Moving Picture Theaters.

The interviews which Miss Nixola Greely Smith prints in The Evening World of New York City are always interesting, human and timely. This lady seems to have the happy knack of making people talk freely and entertainingly and also in an agreeably natural way. Sometimes they talk nonsense, but then that is inevitable in newspaper interviews, which have to please both the interviewed and the interviewer as well as the public.

No greater nonsense was ever talked than in an interview which Miss Nixola Greely Smith printed in the World on Saturday, February 19. The subject of this interview was the Rev. Anna Shaw, a lady so well known in the ranks of progress that it is unnecessary to say anything at all about her qualifications for eminence. Dr. Shaw is a woman of whom the country may justly be proud. But now and again, like all zealots, she damages the cause she espouses by far too ardent a partisanship. In the course of the interview to which we are referring she dealt, of course, with the progressive possibilities that lie before the modern woman. Dr. Anna Shaw is quoted as making the following reference to the moving picture theater:

Recruiting Stations of Vice.

> There should be a police woman at the entrance of every moving picture show and another inside. These places are the recruiting stations of vice. In Chicago recently twenty-three young girls in one month were lured from a moving picture show and shipped to Texas for immoral purposes on the representation that they were being engaged for a theatrical spectacle. This could never have happened had two police women been stationed there.

Moreover, the newspaper in making up this interview in its columns repeated Dr. Shaw's unfortunate phrase, "Recruiting Stations of Vice." So that with the weighty authority of Dr. Shaw, with the enormous publicity in the Evening World, the moving picture theater, rightly or wrongly, falls under this terrible stigma of being a "Recruiting Station of Vice."

We think it is the duty of every honorable man engaged in the business to protest against this odious slander. For it is nothing but a slander. No doubt in the lower quarters of large cities there are moving picture theaters where people of indifferent reputation gather, and where, if you like, recruits are to be had for the white slave traffic. Yet slaves for this traffic are sometimes to be had in Sunday schools, churches and chapels, and other places where women and girls congregate. Again, the police records show that clergymen—and we make this counter-blow with much reluctance—are, occasionally, at least, as vicious as any other section of the community. In other words, there are good and bad everywhere.

In all our experience of moving picture theaters, both in this country and abroad, we have never seen anything take place in them to justify Dr. Shaw's aspersion. We have been in small theaters in many parts of New York City, Brooklyn, Chicago and other large cities. We have gone in like any other member of the public, paid our money and taken our seat with the rest. The very next day after the publication of Dr. Shaw's article, we made it our duty to pay a surprise visit to a five-cent moving picture theater in New York City, which we calculated would be crowded with a miscellaneous audience. We mixed with that audience, unknown to the proprietors of this nickelodeon, and we saw nothing compatible with Dr. Shaw's aspersion. The frequenters of this particular theater are drawn from the industrial classes: poor men and women, boys and girls; and yet they were as well-behaved as they could reasonably be expected to be if Dr. Anna Shaw were lecturing.

It is not necessary for us to pursue this refutation and denial of a most uncharitable slander upon what is called the poor man's theater. But a protest is certainly called for. We protest against the publication of this part of the interview. We think the lady who took the interview should have been more careful in what she printed. We think that Dr. Anna Shaw should guard herself against damaging generalizations on such comparatively slender evidence as "that in Chicago, recently, etc., etc." It is unjust, it is uncharitable, it is, we go so far as to say, positively malicious, to condemn an entire class on one or two flimsy bits of evidence. Note what this reverend lady says: "There should be a police woman at the entrance of every moving picture show and another inside These places are the recruiting stations of vice." We call upon all reputable moving picture theater exhibitors all over the country; we call upon licensed and independent manufacturers; we call upon the honorable firms whose advertisements appear in our pages; we call upon the readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD to join us in telling the Rev. Dr. Anna Shaw that she does not know what she is talking about. We hope she will be more careful of what she says in the future.

Educational Moving Pictures.

It is pleasanter for us to discuss what some public-spirited men and women in New York City are doing for the popularization of the moving picture than it is to deal with the rabid utterances of unfortunate fanatics of the Dr. Anna Shaw type. The very same evening when her spiteful attack upon the moving picture houses was published there was being held in New York City a meeting of prominent educators to witness a display of educational moving pictures.

This experiment was due to the idea of City Superintendent of Schools William H. Maxwell, who seems to be of the opinion that moving pictures may be applied to the education of children in New York City. There were many members of the Board of Education and visiting educators present at the display of pictures. These dealt with such subjects as tobacco culture; chemistry; fishing industry; wild beasts in their haunts, etc. This exhibition is to be repeated in various parts of the city, and although it is not yet certain that the city authorities will adopt the moving picture for educational purposes, yet there is no doubt in our mind that this demonstration will have some effect in expediting that end. In other words, scientific progress will demand the use of the picture for instructive purposes.

Two weeks ago we asked the exhibitors to give us their opinions on the educational subject and also what was the most popular film shown during the past three months. Out of the interesting replies received, which we will publish as space permits, we select the following from an exhibitor in a town in New York State, which fairly expresses the attitude of intelligent exhibitors toward the educational or travel subject:

Moving Picture World:

Dear Sirs—The little paragraph at the bottom of page 289 caught my attention. The constant cry of our patrons is for educational, industrial and scenic pictures. As an exhibitor in a small town, I would venture it as my opinion that the film manufacturers would make pictures in general more popular by issuing more of the kind mentioned. The growth of the business will then, in my opinion, be vitally affected for the better. The educational possibilities of the moving picture are great. The unjust scepticism some people now have toward this form of entertainment will be lessened with the cultivation by manufacturers of the educational field. We figure that the best advertising we can do is to feature the educational films. Yours very truly,

G. H. C.

We would like to hear from more exhibitors on this question. Meanwhile the manufacturers are actively engaged on work that will bring the moving picture into wider spheres of usefulness.

Our readers well know, as we pointed out a few weeks ago, what Mr. Charles Urban and Mr. George Kleine are doing for the educational moving picture. Moreover, we happen to know that the latter gentleman is busy on a scheme whereby the microscopic moving picture will be introduced into universities, public schools and all centers of instruction. You will look into the microscope and see instead of the still picture the moving picture of similar objects.

We are glad indeed to see the action taken by the People's Institute in showing what can be done for education by the moving picture. We have noticed that in what Dr. Anna Shaw so unfortunately calls these "Recruiting Stations of Vice," educational moving pictures are invariably popular. Over and over again we have referred to the fact in these columns. While this is so, the progress of the moving picture in favor with the public is bound to continue.

THE "DRAMATIC MOMENT."

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

Having, I think with success, played the part of Brutus in Shakespeare's "Julius Caesar" in the last term of my school days, and having, moreover, assisted in the production of the play in which, besides being the fiery Brutus, I doubled several other non-speaking parts, it was a tolerably sure thing that when I left school I should be interested in theatrical matters. So it proved to be.

The very first money that I earned from a newspaper was in the capacity of assistant dramatic critic. This was at the mature age of 15. It was my business to take the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table. I was pleased to have them, for they were toothsome, and they were the means of giving me a love for the theater and the drama that has remained with me all my life.

Since that time I have had many associations with the theater and with those who make the theater their business—whether it be in a managerial, histrionic or administrative capacity. May I also, at the risk of being thought too egotistical, tell the reader that besides being a novelist, I am and also have been dramatist (and probably shall be again); that I have studied the technique of the theater, in the theater; have assisted in many successful productions and, generally speaking, know as much of the business from the inside as well as the outside as any man of similar opportunities and experience?

A long course of theatergoing, and an apprenticeship to the moving picture development, has taught me the wisdom of doing that which Sir Charles Wyndham recommended aspiring authors to do, the other day. Said Wyndham: "When you go to the theater, study the people around you, see what they like and why they like it. Then go home and write your play." Unconsciously Wyndham uttered a thought that has been present in my mind for a long time past. It is this: that moving picture audiences, like other audiences, are influenced very much by the mood of the moment. A moving picture audience may be likened to a delicate musical instrument upon which the executant, in the shape of the moving picture, plays with greater or less effect. If the executant is an accomplished musician, then the effect obtained is bound to be satisfying, esthetically and emotionally.

In other words, the average audience responds to the moods or sentiment shown on the screen. Which of these moods is predominant? Which has the most permanent effect? Which takes the average habitue of the theater back again to the theater in the hope of seeing something like what was seen before, of having the same thrill, the same sensation, the same chord touched, the same note struck? Which of these is it that the average patron of a moving picture theater is mostly influenced by at the time and likely to be attracted to again in the future? I have no hesitation in saying it is what is called the dramatic moment. The climax of the story.

Of the hundreds of pictures which I have looked at this last year, but a few of them linger in the memory, and, oddly enough, in comparing notes with others who go to the theater, men of my own way of thinking seem to appreciate the very same point. For example: There was that famous Biograph picture which provoked a woman sitting near me in a Fourteenth street theater to exclaim, "Thank God, they are saved," when the husband returns to free his wife from the attack of burglars. To quote Garrick, "The house rose" at this dramatic moment. It had been cleverly worked up to. As the film progressed, the people seemed to think that the situation had got to be saved, and their excitement was increased when they wondered how it was to be effected. And when it was done, long pent up feelings were given vent to. The entire audience was one person and the woman who spoke voiced a common feeling.

Then I remember a pretty little Essanay picture in which a woman returns to her room and discovers tthat a burglar is hidden for the purpose of taking her jewels. It was absorbing to watch the play of the woman's mind and how she was preparing to outwit the intruding assailant. When she left the room and returned, and after her return the police broke in and surprised the startled burglar, one felt again that one had reached a cleverly wrought out and thought out climax.

Pathe's "La Grand Breteche" was full of these dramatic moments. You all remember the story of the husband who returns to find, or rather to suspect, that his wife has been dallying with a lover during his absence. He knows, and she knows, that the lover is in the room behind the door that is visible to the audience. And when that door is bricked up we are in for a series of very dramatic sensations indeed!

People seem to like dramatic movements in the moving picture. I know I do. I like to see the plot move consistently and with a swing towards its climax. Judged by this standard, then, a great many of the films that are produced are undramatic. They are discoursive, disconnected, though they may be spectacular, photographically beautiful and well acted, pleasing the eye but not stirring the deeper emotions. Of course, it would not do for all our films to be intensely dramatic, as was pointed out last week. A large section of the community favor comedy subjects. But even comedy subjects can be, and I suggest ought to be, dramatic; in that there should come a supreme moment when the whole interest of the film is made manifest by a single situation. When the moment, when a moment that has been led up to by the playwright arrives, then we feel that the cardinal point of the story has been reached. "Wasn't that good," we say one to another; "wasn't that rich, wasn't that funny, wasn't that interesting," as the case may be.

Far be it from me to assume to be teaching the band of capable producers who are sending out moving picture films their business. The critic or the commentator, writing as I do, runs the risk of being told that he knows nothing at all about it. Whether I do, or whether I don't, must of course remain as a matter of opinion. In my first paragraph I endeavored to state my qualifications for offering these views. More than that, I am and always have been a persistent playgoer, and I never fail to learn what other playgoers' and moving picture theater patrons think about the pictures and why they think it. In this short article I have endeavored to tell the reader that there are a vast number of moving picture theater patrons who, like myself, always look for dramatic moments, if I may so call them, in moving pictures, and who if they do not arrive are dissatisfied, or at any rate disappointed. The moving picture play, then, is just like any other stage play, or, indeed, a novel. It has those tense moments that linger in the memory and to which the memory can return again and again. In the film world to-day reputations are being largely made by the really dramatic nature of the subjects treated of. And it will be found that those reputations rely very largely on what I call the dramatic moments of those subjects.

MANAGEMENT.

By S. L. Rothapfel.

It is indeed a deplorable fact that over fifty per cent. of the motion picture theaters of to-day are very badly managed: practically no care is given this most vital principles that apply to the moving picture projector, expoint, which is directly the cause of more failures than all other causes combined. Practically no attention is given to detail, and without detail you can never have a first-class performance.

Like in any other pursuit, to insure success the careful and intelligent manager will first install a system, and strictly adhere to same, swerving only from this path when the welfare of the performance demands it.

Study your conditions carefully; learn the likes and dislikes of your patrons, and cater to them accordingly; see that your house is clean and kept clean; that the air is pure and sweet; that the employees are in their respective places and keep them there—nothing looks so bad as to see your singer or piano player or other attaches of your theater running around the audience, or skylarking. There are few things that will cheapen your house more quickly. Teach them in a nice way, yet be firm, that upon their individual efforts depends the success of the performance as a whole. Teach them and use as a motto, "Everybody work toward the screen." Try to make them take an interest in your business, and prevent them from becoming automatons, or, in other words, keep them out of a rut, for just as soon as they get into a rut you will have a great deal of trouble to get them out of it. Do not tolerate familiarity in your employees, as this will surely destroy their respect for you in the end and make system impossible.

It matters not how humble your theater is, or where it is situated, try and have an air of refinement prevail throughout, try and have everything run smoothly and evenly and as quietly as possible. Noise and motion pictures will never go well together. Have your employees speak softly and as little as possible; and I also strongly advise some covering for the floor of your theater, as there are few things more annoying than to hear someone walking heavily upon an uncarpeted floor while the actors on a screen are depicting some intensely dramatic scene; in fact, the least foreign noise of any kind is very liable to utterly spoil the effect that has taken careful study and a great deal of trouble to produce.

Take pride in your performance and see that your working staff do likewise. As soon as you are satisfied that all they care for is their pay envelope on pay-days, get rid of them quickly for the good of your business.

Try to get acquainted with your patrons, and see that they receive little attentions from you; a nod and a smile as they enter or leave your theater will ofttimes act as balm for a poor performance, and they will appreciate it, too. Show them that you are trying to please them and the results will astonish you.

I have found it a very good policy, especially in small towns where you get the same people nightly, that when you get some good feature reel, or historical subject, to make a brief announcement in a few well-chosen words before each performance, giving them a brief outline of the picture, and, if a historical subject, read it up and then impart what you have learned—not in a speech, as that is very likely to become tiresome, but just in a few words—and you will be very surprised at the different interest that your audience will take, and how much it will enhance your picture. Of course, careful judgment must be used in a case of this kind, but it will help considerably.

Do not allow any of your attaches to smoke in or about the theater during a performance, and do not smoke yourself. Dress neatly and keep well groomed, as it won't help your place any if the manager appears slovenly; you should set an example for your employees.

I want to impress one thing upon you, my brother exhibitors, for the welfare of your performance and for the welfare of motion pictures—and that is a careful rehearsal of your show.

After all is in readiness, the music chosen for the respective reels, and reels having been inspected, take a seat in your theater and view your performance from a critical standpoint. Make note of things that you do not like and, if possible, correct them on the spot. Do not let it proceed until you are satisfied that it is all right, and when you are, O. K. it, and you may rest assured that if the performance pleases you it will invariably please your patrons; but be honest with yourself, do not say that is good enough, rather say it must be just so.

Make your relations with your exchange as cordial as you possibly can, and take into consideration that they, too, have their troubles, and, before you go and make a howl, be sure that you are justified. Remember, they are only human like yourself and are just as liable to mistakes, and if you took time to cool off and think the matter over carefully you would never dream of doing what you intended upon first impulse. Select your exchange; tell them what you want, and then stick. Change only if absolutely necessary, as you never can tell what minute you are liable to need your exchange to battle competition, and you may rest assured that they will do all in their power to help you if you have been reasonable and decent to them.

WHAT IS THE MOST POPULAR FILM?

Minersville, Pa., Feb. 22, 1910.

Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—In your issue of February 26 you ask for an opinion from exhibitors as to what, in their opinion, was the most appreciated film shown during the past six months. As an illustration I quote the following:

On November 22 I had on my program "Leather Stocking," put out by the Biograph Co. On or about January 27, one of the eighth grade grammar school teachers asked me if it was possible to again put on that picture. She gave as her reasons that one of the studies that her scholars were taking was American writers, and at that time were on the works of J. Fenimore Cooper, and she informed me that those of her scholars who had seen this picture when it was put on in November seemed to more readily grasp the study than those who did not see it. I again put this picture on my program with two others, and the result was that the teacher in question was present with her whole school, and immensely enjoyed the entire program.

The superintendent of the schools has asked me to inform him when I have any industrial pictures on; this I do, and he then announces it in all the schools. One other film that I featured and which pleased greatly was "The Prodigal Son." Trusting this little may help along your good work, I am,

Respectfully,

CHAS. F. KEAR,
Mgr. Opera House.

THANHOUSER COMPANY: A NEW FILM PRODUCER.

LARGE MANUFACTURING PLANT HAS BEEN INSTALLED AT NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.

Strong addition to the Independent Ranks.

A new star has appeared on the moving picture horizon that promises to develop into one of the first magnitude before many seasons have passed. "Only forty-five minutes from Broadway," in the very town made famous by George M. Cohan, another actor-manager (perhaps equally prominent in his sphere), has deserted the living stage and cast his lot with the silent drama. Edwin Thanhouser, theater owner, manager and erstwhile director of his own stock company, has given up a business that brought him more wealth than to many of his compeers, and he has settled down in New Rochelle to spend it in making moving pictures after his own ideals.

We had heard considerable about this new manufacturing plant along the line of the New York & New Haven Railroad, and journeying thither we were directed to the large building, of which we show a photograph, by a New Rochelle citizen, who seemed not a little proud of the new industry in their midst. And they have reason to be, for it has all the outside evidence of prosperity and stability and it houses the most efficient and most complete moving picture manufacturing plant that has yet been established in this country as an initial venture.

We have cast our optics on quite a few fixed stars, shooting stars, planets and comets in the film manufacturing field, and we were anxious to dissect the personality of this new aspirant to fame and dollars, for such were the reasons, Mr. Thanhouser finally admitted, that prompted him to relinquish a lucrative profession and embark in a new field. In the prime of life, clean-cut, sincere, and with a self-assurance based upon the success of his past career, Mr. Thanhouser inspires confidence and respect. He has been identified with the stage for the past twenty-five years, for the last fifteen of which he was director of his own stock company. "And," said he, "I made enough to retire."

"But, instead, you have sunk it in the moving picture game."

"No, not sunk it. I have invested part of it here, and if this goes up to-morrow, I still have enough to live on."

"What attracted you into this field?"

"I saw its possibilities. I became filled with the idea that I could produce better pictures than the majority of those I had seen. That idea became a determination. I studied the situation and the market. To be frank with you, I applied for a license as a manufacturer, but was, of course, refused, as I then had no plant and may be said to have known nothing of the business. I have great respect for the Motion Picture Patents Company and appreciate what their protection means to the licensed manufacturer and to the moving picture business; but this was not helping me to realize my ambitions. So I set about seeing how I could make pictures without infringing upon patent rights, and being convinced that the Bianchi camera gave that protection, I placed an order for one and four months ago leased this building. It was an empty shell, with no heating plant, and it took considerable time to get this installed and the skylight and arc lamps. During that time we made some outside scenes and now we have several subjects completed."

Thanhouser Studio and Factory.

"Mr. Thanhouser, I am intensely interested to know what lines you intend to work upon. What kind of subjects do you intend to produce?"

"We will produce comedy, not the slapstick kind, comedy-drama, and (pulling down several bound volumes of plays) you see all these dramas played by the Thanhouser Stock Company. We have plenty of good material to select from and in due time I will produce some of the classics that I have staged. But we will keep away from the wild, wooly, Western, over-acted, overdone, cowboy style of melodrama."

"Amen to that! Now, do you depend upon getting experienced employees and actors from other manufacturers? If you have vacancies, we have several applicants on file."

"I do not want producers or actors from any other manufacturer. I will train my own stock company. That is not new to me. Of course, I had to get experienced men for the mechanical departments, but I do not believe in trying to draw men from any other manufacturer, either licensed or independent, and I would want to be treated in the same way. If an experienced man comes to me, who is out of employment, that is another matter. All men must live."

Mr. Thanhouser then guided us through the various departments and into the large studio, where a scene was being rehearsed. Not having seen the latest improved Bianchi camera, we were allowed to examine one of the two that the firm possesses and found it to be, in construction and solidity, a great improvement over the one shown to us by Mr. Bianchi over a year ago. Cleanliness and order prevailed everywhere throughout the factory and studio, and Mr. Thanhouser is evidently a believer in having things right first—then go ahead.

He next took us into the exhibition room, where we were shown what will be his first and second releases. "The Actor's Children" (March 15), a clean and attractive story, and "St. Elmo" (March 22), a dramatization of the famous novel of the same name. It did not take many scenes to convince us that a master hand had directed their production. The acting was free and natural, the setting was convincing, and there was nothing lacking, even in the quality of the photography, to place the work on a par with concerns who have been in the business years instead of months, and infinitely superior to much that has been and is being produced.

We can say no more until the films have had their chance upon the public screen, except this, that independent exhibitors will make no mistake by insisting on having these films on their programs. Exchanges may order, subject to screen approval, for, Mr. Thanhouser says, the films are "made to sell—on their merit."

HOUSE FLY ACTORS MAKE THEIR DEBUT ON THE STAGE.

Tiny Nuisance Makes Biggest Kind of a Hit—His Success Calculated to Prove Blow That Will Have Fatal Ending.

[From the New York "Evening Telegram."]

PARISH HOUSE.—"The Housewife and the Fly," a continuous drama, written by Mr. Moving Picture.

Mr. House Fly.....Mr. Stingem Bacteria
Mrs. Flat Fly.....Miss Handa Germ
The Fly Twins.....Little Larvæ
Juggling Flies.....Messrs. Pesky Nuisance
And all the other little Flies.....Supernumeraries

Again Mr. House Fly, persevering and as pesky as of yore, appears in the limelight. This is a literal truth, for he has made his first appearance in New York City on the public stage. This took place last week in the Parish House of the Church of the Messiah. Although credit is here given grudgingly, it must be set forth, in the interests of veracity, that the tiny nuisance, with a full company of carefully trained actors and actorines, made the biggest hit of his long and varied career.

The try-out on the "dog" of the tabloid drama of the humble but energetic fly was had in Washington, D. C., the city where vastly more pretentious stars have striven for footlight fame. There, in the presence of Senators, Representatives in Congress and other notables, the American Civic Association, in the District of Columbia Building, on Wednesday began a moving picture campaign of education, the object of which is to hand the fly a swat that will prove fatal.

This crusade, which has the indorsement of President William Howard Taft, among many other well known public men, is to be carried on in every State in the Union and in Canada by the novel aid of the moving picture film. A committee of scientists and business men, headed by Mr. Edward Hatch, Jr., of New York City, is directing the work. Mr. Hatch first conceived the idea of telling the public by means of pictures just how dangerous the fly is and what he costs the country in lives and money each year.

Stunts by Mr. Fly.

In carrying out his unique plan Mr. Hatch commissioned Mr. H. V. Andrews to visit England, where moving pictures were made in accordance with suggestions supplied. A series of educational views of a remarkable character were produced by a London firm and brought to America by the Kleine Optical Company. In the pictures the fly appears as large as a hen and performs all sorts of acrobatic stunts that prove not only educational, but entertaining as well. The performance in this city was the first public one of a large number that will be given in schools, churches, theaters and other places in every city in the United States.

Put in the form of a life drama of the fly, the moving pictures take an added interest and make a most attractive entertainment which carries home its lessons of cleanliness perhaps more forcibly than the work could be accomplished in almost any other manner.

In the first act of "The Housewife and the Fly" the films portray various home scenes. Flashed on the screen, in the limelight oval, a fly is pictured taking a sip of honey from the point of a needle, showing the action of the proboscis, which is very much like the trunk of an elephant in miniature. Other pictures show the tongue, with every microscopic hair distinct. How the busy little worker packs his valise full of bacteria and carries them along to the next boarding house or flat is here shown.

Twenty-Minute Drama.

The second act of this little life history is entitled "How Flies Carry Contagion." In it the scenes follow one another in rapid succession, so that the most thoughtless spectator cannot fail to grasp their full significance. One view shows the fly on the nipple of a baby's feeding bottle, and, last of all, a pretty baby placidly sucking the mouthpiece from which the flies have just departed.

The whole life drama is played in about twenty minutes; "but in that brief time," said Mr. Hatch, "the average man, woman or child learns more of the dangers arising from the fly pest than could be imparted by twelve months of lectures or twelve volumes of literature on the subject. These pictures will be the most popular and important feature of the anti-fly campaign in 1910, and will be shown in thousands of moving picture theaters throughout the country, as well as before schools and scientific societies.

"Our first idea," continued Mr. Hatch, in describing his plan to a "Telegram" reporter, "was to construct a huge model of the housefly, showing its physical structure on a highly magnified scale, like the model of the mosquito in the American Museum of Natural History. We decided, however, that this would not answer our purpose so well as moving pictures of the insect.

First Fly Photographs.

"The model would take a long time to construct and could appeal to only comparatively limited numbers, while the motion pictures could be shown to millions of persons at once. When I began investigating the subject and got in touch with the makers of moving picture films in this country and abroad, I found that such photographs of this insect had never been made. One big firm in London had made motion pictures of birds, animals and insects—the latter including the flea and the mosquito—but not of the fly. The fly before this project of ours never had been photographed while at work, so far as I have been able to find out.

"We shall put the moving pictures in the hands of every exhibitor of motion pictures, of whom there are more than seven thousand in the United States. One-third of the spectators at the moving picture shows are children. We shall keep up the work in the public schools throughout the United States. We are especially desirous of having the enthusiastic and earnest co-operation of the three thousand women's clubs in the United States with their 150,000 members, and of having these pictures shown before them also.

"It is the women—the housewives—who can do more than any other class to abolish the plague of flies. We are getting in touch with these societies and pushing the campaign as fast as possible. It is a big task, but we shall not rest until we have achieved it."

Study of the statuary, paintings and antiques in the Metropolitan Museum of Art by the children of the public schools is a plan that is now being considered by the superintendent of schools and his associates. Another idea which is receiving attention and which will probably be carried out at the same time is the use of moving pictures in the schools for the education of the pupils.

These two projects are in charge of Mr. Gustave Straubenmuller, assistant to City Superintendent Maxwell, and are an outcome of the success that has attended the study by the school children of exhibits in the Museum of Natural History.

Moving Pictures as Instructors.

Dr. Maxwell recently witnessed an exhibition of moving pictures by Mr. Charles Sprague Smith and was very favorably impressed with the idea of using them to help educate the children. If the idea is adopted, pictures of historical subjects and of the great men of the country, living and dead, portrayed by capable actors, will be shown.

Practical application of the pictures to teaching chemistry, commercial geography, nature study and history is contemplated.

For some time groups of pupils from the various schools throughout the city have been taken to the Museum of Natural History under the guidance of teachers, the visits usually being made on Saturdays. Those who were unable to visit the museum have received instruction through what the museum calls its "circulating collection." This consists of numerous specimens that are loaned to the schools for certain periods, being passed along from one school to another.

Requests have been coming in from pupils and teachers for exhibitions of collections from the Museum of Art, but as it would be impossible to compile a "circulating collection" of these exhibits, it has been decided to take the pupils to the museum.

But there will be restrictions In the first place, only the pupils in the two highest elementary grades will be allowed to view the exhibits and in the second place all pupils admitted to the classes for the study of art will be required to bring written permission from their parents or guardians.

Paintings and Statuary as Object Lessons to Pupils.

It is planned to have some teacher assigned from each school to conduct the classes to the museum. There they will be taken in hand by Miss Fenton, a museum worker and lecturer, who will explain all about the works of art and give the pupils the correct perspective. She will instruct them as to the correct viewpoint from which to view the various art objects.

Aside from the visits of classes of pupils to the museum it is planned to include lectures in the schools on different phases and schools of art. This is intended to prepare the minds of the pupils for the proper understanding of the art works they are to view later.

Up to the present time children of the public schools have not been permitted to view the collections at the Museum of Art, although some groups of high school pupils have been admitted.

Negotiations are now under way with the museum authorities looking to an arrangement advantageous to the children. Mr. Straubenmuller, who is chairman of the Committee on the Course of Study, has made a proposition to Mr. Robert W. de Forest, secretary of the Metropolitan Museum, and has been encouraged to go ahead with his plans.

Lectures are now given to classes from the public schools at the Museum of Natural History, at the Zoological Park and at the Botanical Gardens and they have proved very successful.—New York "Telegram."

MOVING PICTURES AS A CURE FOR INSANITY.

At the State Asylum for the Nebraska Insane, located at Norfolk, Neb., the State Board of Public Lands and Buildings has authorized Dr. Percival, superintendent, to experiment on the inmates, being convinced by his argument that moving pictures have a soothing effect upon the minds of insane persons and that many cases of mild insaity have bee cured by the same means.

Dr. Percival holds that the viewing of pictures produces the most soothing effect upon the mind where they are shown in action, and that the rapid change in the view will be much more beneficial than any regular course of treatment that could be suggested by experts.

A small private picture machine has been operated at the asylum a number of times, and after each exhibition Dr. Percival says he has been able to note a greatly improved mental condition among the patients who gazed upon the pictures.

POPULARITY OF MOTION PICTURES.

Four millions of people go to motion picture shows in the country every day, according, to a recent estimate which seems to be reasonably accurate. In twenty-five days, or less than a month, more than the entire population of the United States have been to motion picture theaters. To carry this a bit further, it is pertinent to add that this total is four times as great as go to all other theaters combined.

The unquestioned influence of the motion picture is here very graphically presented. An industry which appeals directly to 4,000,000 people a day, or 25,000,000 a week, is not to be slighted. It is a powerful business force, an element which cannot be ignored and which exerts an influence second to none in the country.

Pursuing the subject a bit further, it will be recognized that the educational opportunities in motion pictures are greater than in any one thing, excepting the schools. And yet, even when the comparison is pushed to that point, it is found that but four and one-half times as many go to school each day as go to motion pictures. Further, those who go to school are all children, of varving ages, of course, while the motion picture is a force which acts upon all ages alike. Its appeal is universal, and its influence is beyond estimation.

Fortunately, most manufacturers realize their responsibilities and maintain their films on a very high plane, both morally and intellectually. Comparatively little complaint is heard now, and there is a steady improvement in all directions. Dramatically there is no longer reason for criticism in the direction of offering pictures which appeal to, or encourage, depravity. Quite the contrary is true, and the standard of acting is gradually improving. More and better actors are employed and the work is more satisfactory from every standpoint.

The same is true of the photography. Improvements are rapid, and during the present year there will be changes of far more importance than have yet occurred. It is worth while working for 4,000,000 people a day. The incentive is sufficient to urge producers to a very high grade of work.

PROGRESS OF KINEMATOGRAPHY.

In our last issue we expressed the hope that Kinemacolor, or the Urban-Smith motion picture process in natural colors, might be exploited for the benefit of the American public. We are glad to announce that the process has been acquired for America by the Motion Picture Patents Company, of New York. We understand that this firm is in a much better position even than a theater magnate with twice the capital to attend to the manifold details of this new enterprise. On account of the necessarily great expense, motion pictures in natural colors will be a luxury that can be afforded by few of the cheaper motion picture houses—thank the Lord! It requires intelligent and capable operators to do it justice, and these are not usually found in second-class show places.

Every lover of kinematography will rejoice that a new era has arrived in this important class of entertainment. It is high time, for it was being rapidly degraded. But there is still room for further improvement, noticeably in the number of pictures taken and projected, which now averages only sixteen per second! For this reason, human beings, animals, vehicles, water craft and other objects, which move in a direction approximately parallel to the plane of the picture, are annoyingly blurred, whereas objects approaching, or receding from, the point of sight (the camera) are generally well defined, except when they leave the field of sharp focus. For instance, a person standing in the foreground or middle-distance will appear quite sharp; but the instant he begins to move away, however slowly—except in a direction parallel with the axis of the lens and then only within the limits of the focal planes—his appearance loses distinctness of form and detail. Fortunately, this feature is not impossible of improvement. It is merely a matter of increasing the number of exposures and, consequently the amount of film per second, which, however, augments the cost of the ultimate result—the positive film ready for projection; but second-class purveyors are generally not eager to provide their patrons with the best products of kinematography, so long as they continue to endure the rubbish now being shown.

[If the editor of our contemporary were in as close touch with the progress of kinematography as we are, he would not allow himself to say that it was being "rapidly degraded." The exact opposite is the case. Moreover, the number of blurred pictures produced is singularly small. It is doubtful if Kinemacolor has been acquired by the Patents Company. Finally, to characterize the pictures now being shown as "rubbish" inclines us to think that Mr. French, the editor of "Photo Era," has a very impeffect knowledge of what is being accomplished in the moving picture field.—Ed. M. P. W.]

"KINEMACOLOR AND SOME AMERICAN CRITICISMS."

This is the title of an eight-page pamphlet issued by the Natural Color Kinematograph Company, 89 Wardour street, London, W., in the course of which the author, Mr. Charles Urban, replies to some practical criticisms of kinemacolor that appeared in our pages and those of the Dramatic Mirror shortly after the Madison Square demonstration last December. Those of our readers interested in the subject should obtain a copy of this pamphlet of the Natural Color Kinematograph Company. We understand from Mr. Urban that he proposes to be in the United States next month, April, and then we shall probably have further opportunities of dealing with such phases of kinemacolor as may be necessary to refer to in our pages. Indeed, we have asked Mr. Urban to write us an article on the subject, which will be published contemporaneously with his presence in the United States next April.

PATENTS.

By Maxwell Stevenson.

What is a patent? This is a question that has been answered time after time, argued in the United States courts written of in books on the subject, and is still bothering people. But a full exemplification must not be expected in the space at our command, as we desire to write on several sections or branches of the question. Briefly, then, a patent is a grant from the Government to an individual, or several individuals, of the exclusive right for a term of years to make, use or sell some particular invention or discovery. The word discovery in this case is misleading; to inventors it means invention pure and simple. This apparently sole monopoly is, however, not an odious monopoly. In "Robinson on Patents" we read that a patent "lays no burden upon the people except that of remaining for a while without that which they never yet enjoyed." A live definition, and one that is the kernel of the subject at issue.

Extension of Patents.—A patent cannot be extended beyond the term of years for which it is granted, except by act of Congress. As above written, a patent is a monopoly and public sentiment is opposed to extension of monopolies.

What is Patentable.—A patent may be obtained or granted for any new and useful art (process), machine, article of manufacture, or a composition of matter, including mechanical or chemical compounds relating to the various arts, etc., as well as for new and useful improvements in connection therewith, for the grant of a patent for an invention will not stop or hinder the grant on an improvement in such invention. The inventors must not, however, use each other's inventions. An invention to be patentable must not only be useful, but it must be novel. There are various forms, statutory and otherwise, that determine the question of novelty and usefulness, but it may be broadly stated that when a person conceives an invention which is original to him, and at the same time is useful and new in the general acceptation of the term, a patent may be obtained therefor. Naturally each case has its peculiarities, and must, therefore, be handled as well as answered separately; no two cases are similar. As long as the contemplated improvements are not such as would bring the change in the plane of equivalents it is safe to say that a patent will issue.

Who May Obtain a Patent.—A patent may be obtained by any person (man, woman or child, citizen or alien, and the administrator of the estate of a deceased inventor, as well as the guardian of an insane inventor), who has invented something new and not known or used for a certain period, and not printed in any publication. Upon the death of an inventor, before application, the latter can only be made by the executor or administrator, to whom the patent will issue. In case of death after application, but prior to the issuance of the patent, the same will be issued to the executor or administrator.

Joint Inventors.—Where two persons work together to produce an invention, each contributing suggestions and efforts, a joint application can be made, but in cases where a person furnishes the capital only, a joint application cannot be made, though a part of the interest can be assigned to such person by the inventor, for a patent would not be valid in which one of the parties interested has signed the papers without being a co-inventor.

Caveats.—A caveat is a document properly prepared in which the inventor sets forth his invention and prays that protection (which will be explained) may be had until he shall have completed his invention. This implied protection remains in force for but one year, but can be renewed. Its principal, in fact, only statutory function, is to prevent the issuing of a patent to another for the same invention until the caveator has had an opportunity to file a completed application, and then contest the right to the invention by interference proceedings. It, further, gives no rights than that above; it is not a "patent applied for," and should a completed application be filed for the same intention, the caveator is notified to have his complete application prepared and filed within a certain time. A caveat really gives an inventor an opportunity to bring his invention to a working basis, while being able to show, should an interference be afterwards declared, that his invention in almost its entirety was subject of caveat protection from a certain undisputable date. Applications for caveats, like patents, are held in secrecy by the Patent Office.

Patent Applied For.—This term is very often a source of imaginary trouble for the inventor; he wants to know if he can manufacture and sell his invention and be protected; also, if infringement be discovered, can he prosecute. An application is a request for the Commissioner of Patents to grant a patent for an article as described in the specifications and shown in the drawings, and until such issues there is no real protection—that is covering infringement, for, on the other hand, there is no actual infringement. True, a person can manufacture and sell, and by marking the goods with the words "Patent applied for" or "Patent pending," he gives notice that his intention is to secure a patent, and, further, if any one "infringes," it is apt to cause a suit to recover damages if such act is continued after the patent issues. But no action can be brought against an alleged infringer until after the patent has been issued.

There are other features to be considered in the practice, but as they lean to the technical, and are difficult to explain in a short article, they will not be gone into, except to mention a few, such as: "What Constitutes Infringement;" "Interferences;" "Use and Publicity;" "Reduction to Practice;" "Abandonment;" "Equivalents," and "Novelty." To answer any of the above would require a full knowledge of any particular case coming under any of the headings.

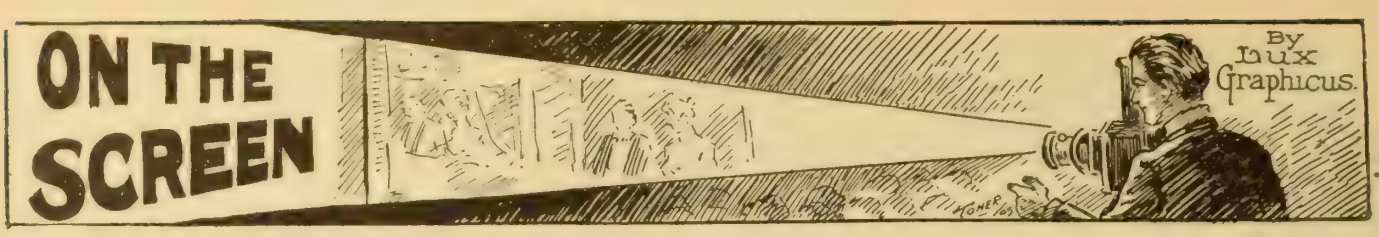
AMONG THE SHOWS.

The Bronx Hippodrome, on Prospect avenue, under the management of J. M. Cohen, seats 294 persons and does not exhibit vaudeville. Most houses seating from 250 to the seating capacity of an ordinary theater have vaudeville as a part of the entertainment but Mr. Cohen does not believe in having vaudeville as a part of the entertainment of a moving picture theater. The Bronx Hippodrome opened on New Year's Day and has been giving the public nothing but pictures and illustrated songs, which are appreciated by its patrons. It is a well ventilated theater and is well provided with exits. The only thing that was not deserving of our commendation was the kind of music played while the Vitagraph picture, "The Life of Moses," Part 4, was on the screen.

The Mystic Theater, 1313 Boston road, Bronx, under the management of A. Rosenthal, gives Independent pictures and vaudeville. For a couple of days he was featuring Signor Di Noto and his band, which played patriotic airs while slides of Washington and other pictures were thrown upon the screen. This place is also well ventilated and is well fitted with exits. The entertainment as a whole was worth the admission price.

"WIZARD OF OZ," SELIG'S BIG EASTER RELEASE.

Folk lore, legends, myths and fairy tales have followed childhood through the ages, for every healthy youngster has a wholesome and instinctive love for stories fantastic, marvelous and manifestly unreal. The winged fairies of Grimm and Anderson have brought more happiness to childish hearts than all other human creations. Yet the old-time fairy tale, having served for generations, may not be classed as "historical" in the children's library, for the time has come for a series of newer "wonder tales" in which the stereotyped genie, dwarf and fairy are eliminated, together with all the horrible and blood-curdling incidents devised by their authors to point a fearsome moral to each tale. Modern education includes morality; therefore the modern child seeks only entertainment in its wonder tales and gladly dispenses with all disagreeable incident. The Selig Polyscope Company having this thought in mind, the film of "The Wizard of Oz" was produced to please the grown-ups and children of to-day. It aspires to being a modernized fairy tale, in which the wonderment and joy are retained and the heartaches and nightmares are left out.



Representative Mellen, of Worcester, Mass., whose stupid attack on the moving picture formed the theme of one of my little sermons on the screen a few weeks ago, has stepped down from his pinnacle of absurdity in favor of a lady, the Rev. Dr. Anna Shaw, whose uncharitable references to the moving picture house are dealt with in another part of this week's World. Mellen occupied his melancholy pontificate of fanaticism only a few short weeks. Dr. Anna Shaw, in the Papacy of persecution, is, it seems, to have even a shorter reign. Law making and divinity are to be replaced by justice in the campaign of persecution against the moving picture which seems to have recently reopened.

I feel a very great personal soreness in this matter. Wherever I go in New York City I am identified with the moving picture. And when I sit in my little restaurant day by day or in my tea house, around about Broadway or Fourth avenue, my conversation with those whom I meet is about the moving picture, its progress, its influence, its qualities, its popularity and the like. Similarly, whenever I penetrate into that hive of philanthropy known as the Charity Building, the talk there with my friends is about the moving picture and its excellencies. In all my life I am standing up for the moving picture.

If I thought for a moment, if I had to admit for half a moment, that what Mellen said about the picture house was true, and that what this lady, Dr. Anna Shaw, also says about it was anywhere near the mark, I would not stay in the business another five minutes. I am not alone in this. To read what these people say about the picture theater anyone would think that it was purposely made the excuse for the vile trade in immorality which flourishes in the lower parts of the city—of every city—and, let it also be said, in parts of the great White Way and also, let it be said, in the immediate vicinity of 287 Fourth avenue. Anybody might think that there was absolutely no good in picturedom, and that the ten or twelve thousand picture houses throughout the United States were simply so many dens of iniquity for ruining women and children!

It is a lie! It is worse than a lie; it is what Tennyson calls "half a lie," because there is just enough truth in the lie to give plausibility. I wonder what Dr. Anna Shaw would say if a picture man turned round and stigmatized every chapel and church in the country as a recruiting station for vice, because some girl or woman who attended the chapel had gone to the devil indirectly on account of her attendance thereat! Yet the picture man would be just as much justified in making this sweeping charge as Dr. Anna Shaw is in condemning the moving picture house. But it was not of Dr. Anna Shaw that I wanted to speak in this column. She has been deposed from her pride of place as the chief temporary persecutor of the moving picture by Judge O'Sullivan, to whom the newspaper man this last week has unconsciously assigned the primacy in the campaign of persecution that has recently broken out.

It seems that some girl was attacked by a youth after a picture show performance and was sentenced by the judge to a term of imprisonment. And the judge is reported to have made a speech adverse to the moving picture show. When justice opens its mouth, dear reader, you and I invariably listen with respect, because the man who makes his way to the judicial bench is not an irresponsible commentator. He has been trained in the study and administration of the law, he is accustomed to deal with matters of fact and while administering the law or dispensing justice and mercy he represents or rather typifies the principles of good government. In other words, a judge is the deputy of the ruler of the country.

Hence it is, that your newspaper man, whenever a judge commits himself to a matter of opinion on manners or morals, takes particular notice of what his honor says. Judicial utterances, you see, make good copy. They carry great influence, and people believe in them as they believe in the utterances of a legislative Representative like Mellen or a theological pastor like Dr. Anna Shaw. For these people are educated people and presumably truth tellers.

* * *

Listen to what the judge says: "There are no snares for the catching and bringing of young girls down to the level of infamy and shame like the moving picture shows. It is time that the mothers and fathers in this city learned that these shows are dens of iniquity where their children may be ruined. The law cannot protect young girls from the human dogs and scoundrels who infest these moving picture shows"!!! It is necessary to tell Judge O'Sullivan what was told Representative Mellen and what is being told Dr. Anna Shaw; that he is libeling an honorable industry a cheap and agreeable form of entertainment, and that he is branding with disgrace thousands and thousands of honorable people engaged in the manufacture, selling and the exhibition of moving pictures.

Here we have the case of a man, presumably well trained in the law, presumably with a level mind and competent to adjudicate upon matters of fact that are presented to him—here we have a man, who, because a boy and a girl misconducted themselves after a moving picture show, brands all these places (which, by the way, are attended each day of the year by from six to eight millions of people in this country), he brands them as dens of iniquity!! In other words, according to Judge O'Sullivan, one-tenth of the population of the United States passes part of its time every day in "dens of iniquity"! Presumably built, if I understand the judge aright, simply for iniquitous purposes!

Now, Judge, just withdraw what you said. When you come up town again, make your way to Mr. Ganes' Moving Picture Theater, at Thirty-first street and Broadway, or to Keith & Proctor's, on Twenty-third street, or to the Auduborn Theater, at 181st street, or to the little Fair, on Fourtenth street, or to the moving picture theater on Park row. Just walk right in like a man; pay your money, and in the interests of truth and justice satisfy yourself that you have made a mistake; that these places are not dens of iniquity; that they are cleanly and well-conducted houses of rational, healthy, stimulating amusement. Because one vicious boy and one stupid girl go wrong after visiting a moving picture show it is no more right for you to stigmatize moving picture shows as dens of iniquity than it would be for you to say that every chapel in this city is a den of iniquity, because Colonel and Mrs. Astor who were secretly divorced the other day and are therefore violating the divine law of the indissolubility of marriage were married in a chapel. One might as well turn round and stigmatize every court in the country as dens of iniquity because injustice was occasionally dispensed there and stupid nonsense talked from the judicial bench.

When I read the utterances of people like Judge O'Sullivan, Dr. Anna Shaw and Mr. Mellen, I regret that we have not in the moving picture field some representative body for putting these fanatics right; for neutralizing in the press the harm which their utterances do. It will be remembered that a year ago the Motion Picture Patents Company started out to protect the interests of the moving picture in the press. This policy was dropped. It seems to me that if the company, as it is at present conducted, cannot do this work, its associated manufacturers should get together and appoint somebody to watch over the interests of the moving picture in the press and to obviate if not prevent the effects of the poisonous utterances of Representative Mellen, Dr. Anna Shaw and Judge O'Sullivan. It is only two weeks ago since I devoted this page to a little note of congratulation that the press of the United States was more favorably disposed towards the moving picture than it used to be, and that the fanatical clergy had stopped their stupid fulminations and ignorant criticisms. But, here we are in the thick of a revived persecution! Is it because of the Lenten season, or the bad weather, that these volcanoes of puritanism have again become active? Will Mr. Mellen, Dr. Shaw or Judge O'Sullivan favor us with a reply?

CHICAGO NOTES.

I am greatly gratified to see that The Moving Picture World is not only read but that its advice is acted upon.

Several theaters, objects of some previous letters, have taken warning, and fully realizing the good work done by the Orpheum, are fast modifying their music, and some are adopting proper sound effects. In other words, the manager, the first one interested in the receipts of the place, is not allowing his pianist and other musicians to amuse themselves with noisy old ragtime tunes to the detriment of pictures. No. Mr. Manager stepped in and seems to have given some strict orders.

At the Pastime they had a Vitagraph picture of a Mexican type. The musicians gave us a good Spanish selection, very appropriate to the production, and several sound effects were rendered. There is still room for improvement, as it is not correct to sound the gallop of horses running on soft ground as loud as if on stone pavement, but as long as the managers show the real spirit of reform, we must be a little lenient, give them time to perfect the music and the sound effects, and encourage them.

The show managers should have the same faith in the future of moving pictures as we find on the part of the manufacturers, and not act on the supposition that pictures are merely a sideshow or a curtain-raiser.

Cinematography is still in its infancy and will last for many generations to come. Capital is invested every day in the erection of new theaters and in the promotion of new branches of the industry.

An example is the great prosperity of Bell & Howell, of 90 Illinois street. These enterprising young men have so many orders booked ahead for their different machines that they are compelled to increase their plant by taking another floor of the same building.

The Old Reliable Film Renovating Company have also been forced out of their old quarters to seek increased facilities at 22 Randolph street.

The exchanges are settling down for business after what has been a sort of general moving.

The American Film Service occupies the bank floor of the building, 77 South Clark street, and looks like a bank with its large, spacious anteroom and its fine hardwood and glass partitions. Six windows with brass ornamented gratings complete the appearance. The windows are marked: "Cashier," "Information," "Booking," "Song Slides," "Films Out," "Films In." Everything looks cheerful and prosperous.

The Standard Film Exchange occupies the whole second floor of the two buildings, 159-161 Washington street, and as the carpenters and painters have completed their work, everything looks as bright as a new penny. A spacious anteroom, furnished with opera chairs, is provided for the operators waiting for and returning with the reels. One side of the front part of the building is occupied by a very tasty private office for Mr. Hopp, in the rear of which is still another smaller private office, a real cozy-corner. The remaining part of the front is devoted to the general offices and a large exhibition room for machines, etc. In the rear is a very large room for the examination and rewinding of the films, with two large vaults in which are kept the reels, each reel in a galvanized iron box. Also in the rear is a well-equipped and well-lighted repair shop and a storeroom for the posters, etc. The center of the floor, back of the partition and windows, is given to the booking office, the song slide department, the film service, etc. With all these increased facilities, the Standard Film Exchange should be well able to take good care of their patrons and maintain their reputation for a prompt and reliable service.

The Unique Film and Construction Company, with the Geo. M. Hoke Supply Company, have just moved to fine quarters at 81 South Clark street, but are not yet through with the carpenters and painters. Although everything is yet in a sort of topsyturvy state, we see evidence of another well-equipped film exchange.

The United States Film Exchange have also secured fine quarters at 81 South Clark street, but, like their neighbors, the Unique Film and Construction Company, they are still in the hands of carpenters, although business goes on as usual.

The licensed exchanges have a "local" and meet every Thursday afternoon. As I have not attended their meetings, I cannot say what is the nature of the business transacted; but it seems to me that if they meet for the general welfare of the moving pictures, they should plan to not conflict with each other and make such arrangements as would insure a full release of all the licensed films. The other day, "The President's Special" was shown on the release day at four theaters in a district of five—at the Boston, at the Pastime, at the Alcazar, at the Orpheum. The Casino was the only place not showing the film. On the same day Vitagraph and Gaumont made releases. The Vitagraph release was shown in three of the places, while I did not see in the district the two pictures of Gaumont. I know for a fact that a lady who had heard of the release of the Vitagraph, "The Wayside Shrine," went the next day on Madison street to see it, but could not find it on the boards. I would like to see the exchanges take advantage of their "local" to arrange the programs so as to give the complete list of the releases and give the public a chance to see a good release on the second day. The exhibitors would gain much, as, if the programs were varied, the lovers of moving pictures would visit all the shows of the street the same day, while to-day they pass the Casino if they see on the board the same picture just witnessed at the Boston or at the Alcazar.

"SHUT UP!"

Enforcing the law.

(From the Newark "News.")

SITUATION IN NEWARK, N. J.

Sheriff Harrigan took a hand last Saturday and notified the police that if they did not act and close the motion picture shows on Sunday, he should. The police, pursuant to their expressed intentions, did not act, and thirty-two places were open all day Sunday, showing pictures to good audiences.

The Sheriff did not like the indifference of the police and says that next Sunday he shall act and close every place he finds open. The question very naturally arises as to whether he can do it or not after the decision of the Supreme Court. In other words, there may be a question to be determined as to how much right the State has to interfere in the home arrangements of the city.

Worse things go on in Newark every Sunday than motion picture shows, and the Sheriff does not interfere. It is hard to understand why he is making a scapegoat of the motion picture man when others even more culpable are permitted to carry on their enterprises, whatever they may be, in defiance of the law. Unquestionably the time is coming when motion picture shows on Sunday will be legalized, as, indeed, they should be, the same as museums, lectures and other educational features and interests. It doesn't seem right that the greatest educational force of this or any other age should be subjected to the same legal restrictions that are applied to a saloon or other injurious agency.

H. W. Friedman and Jack Levy, formerly of the Royal Sign Company and the Greater New York Film Company, respectively, have started in business for themselves under the firm name of the Modern Sign Company, with offices at 124 East Fourteenth Street, New York City. Exhibitors desiring to obtain signs, banners, posters, etc., should correspond with this company, and those who are in a position to visit them, should do so.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

I find that some operators in small towns hesitate to use this column from the fact that their's being the only house, the name of the town preceding the reply would tell their employer that they had been "stuck" on something. Let me say that the name of town will be suppressed when requested, so that no one will know who it is that is asking the question. "Ohio" answered this week, is a case in point.

The Light.—Petolia, Ontario, Can., writes asking what causes the light to show greenish colored and have a dividing line in its middle. This condition, he says, only obtains when the moving picture is on, the stereo picture being clear and all right. You have not said whether you were using direct or alternating current, but I think you must be using alternating and a rheostat. Just why the light shows greenish in tint I cannot say without further information; but the dividing line is caused by your carbons being set wrong. For full directions concerning the setting of carbons I would refer you to pages 187 188, August, 1909, issue, Moving Picture World, where the whole matter is explained and illustrated. I am of the opinion that with your carbons set right the greenish tint you complain of will also disappear. If you have not the issue of The World to which I refer you, it may be had by sending ten cents to the editor. You ought to have it. The matter occupies almost two whole pages and could not well be reproduced in this column.

Relation of Lens and Picture.—Ohio (name of town suppressed by request), asks what size lens he needs to project picture 10 x 13 at 68 feet, also should 9-16 carbons be used on 110-volt alternating current.

To find required lens to project any size picture at any given distance you multiply the throw in feet by width of aperture (picture opening) in fractions of an inch and divide result by width of desired picture in feet. Ordinarily the width of aperture is taken as 1 inch, but for exact results measure the opening with an inside caliper and multiply by the exact width. This will be as exact as you can figure. Moving picture lenses vary considerably. The stereo lens size is had the same way, taking width of aperture (mat in slide) at 3 inches. The result obtained is the equivalent focus of the desired lens and this fact must be stated in ordering.

Five-eighths soft cored carbons, top and bottom, are right for any voltage alternating current. A larger size would only be required for very high amperage or a less size for very light amperage. It is the number of amperes, not the voltage, which determines the size of carbon necessary.

Lantern Slides.—Fort Recovery, Ohio, asks what is necessary to do to ordinary photographic negatives in order to be able to project them. Nothing at all, except to make positives, reduced or enlarged, as the case may be, to slide size, viz., 3¼ x 4 inches. Bind them up with a cover glass and mat just like a regular slide, which in fact they will be. Of course you may color them if you wish, but it is doubtful if you will be successful at that without considerable experience.

Bulging Film.—Fresno, Cal., writes that they are having trouble with their film "bulging" in the center. Say they have put on a new aperture plate, tension springs, new gate new idlers and intermittent sprocket without eliminating the trouble.

You have a hard case, but I think you will find the trouble to be either in the projection lens itself or else due to the fact that your tension springs set in too far on one or both sides. That is to say, one or both of them set over so far towards the picture opening that they are partly off the track of the aperture plate and are causing the film to buckle slightly as it passes under them. By buckling I mean bend in slightly towards the lens as it passes under the springs. Provided your lens is O. K. and your aperture plate not worn at all, I can see no other explanation for the trouble. Won't you kindly advise me if you find this to be a correct solution? First try a different lens on the machine to make sure it is not in the lens itself. It is possible that the springs set too far in the opposite direction, thus causing the film to bulge out instead of in. If you find the above does not answer then try the aperture plate (picture gauge) tracks with a machinist's steel square. It is possible the surface to which the plate is screwed is not true, thus pulling the plate itself out of true—buckling it somewhat.

Picture Out of Focus.—Roxbury, Mass., writes that his picture is out of focus at extreme top, left corner, or extreme bottom, right corner. Before answering must know make of machine and whether or no position of frame-up makes any difference as to which corner appears out of focus. Also do you mean top left corner of screen or aperture it self? Remember the top left corner of picture would be the lower right corner of aperture plate. I await further information.

Size of Condenser Lenses.—Tower City, Pa., asks what size condenser lenses to use for 14 x 16 picture at 50 feet. Says his picture is not brilliant and thinks condensers are of wrong focal length.

You are using about a 3½-inch equivalent focus projection lens and for such a lens should have condensers of equal equivalent focal length.

It is unlikely that lack of brilliancy is caused by wrong condensers, unless they are very wrong, in which case you would have a pronounced "ghost." It is likely your light is not strong enough, i. e., you are not using sufficient current the wrong kind of carbons or carbons not set right. Bear in mind that much, very much depends on the setting of your carbons exactly right.

H. F. HOFFMAN GETS A WALLOP

From a Critic and Replies Herewith.

I received the following by mail, criticising my "article (?)" in the issue of February 5. I dare say that after this I am supposed to be properly "squelched" and should never dare to burst into print again. According to its writer, the moving picture industry seems to be rotting away from its own pure rot, for he uses the word rotten very often without leaving us a definite idea as to just what a rotten picture is. His incoherence is no doubt due to the fire of righteousness within, as is usual with most film critics, and not from any lack of scholarly attainments. The letter:

"H. F. Hoffman,

"Care Moving Picture World.

"Dear Sir—I have read your article (?) in The Moving Picture World and would say to you that for one who has seen many good pictures in those 'parlors' as you call them & have seen some of the most 'depraved' pictures that one can lay eyes upon. Certainly you are as much justified as any one in business just as the saloon keeper or dive keeper is. A clean picture has a good lesson to it; but the others such as the murder & black-mail is nothing but passion to ones mind no other way to put it. Hope you can get some of those good pictures & instead of the poor excuses of the ones you call pictures. Just because you have seen rotten melo-drama, & read Nick Carter & other rotten literature, and it has not hurt you as you claim, How many boys and girls have such rot spoiled? You can count them. Just so the effects of your rotten pictures only the first impression is more effective than print as what one sees always stays with him. Since there are so many good subjects you can choose from. I cant see why you do choose the morbid, rotten subjects you do. The creator of these films simply wants to work on ones baser passions instead of up lifting one. Very truly,

"W. A. POE,
"Cleveland O."

The name of Poe in connection with morbid subjects naturally turns our thoughts to our critic's namesake, Edgar Allan Poe. Here we have two Poes; one of them denouncing the morbid in labored language, while the other has left a name and a school of morbid classics, written in language incomparable. Now which of these two will live the longer in the thoughts of men? Perhaps "Bernice" and "The Tell Tale Heart" were literary mistakes. Then, too, "The Murders in the Rue Morgue" should perhaps be classed as "rotten." It may be that our critic can prove to us that his cousin, Edgar A., was working on "one's baser passions instead of uplifting one," and also that he was "as much justified as anyone in business just as the saloonkeeper or divekeeper is."

The greatest fault of the film critics is the unsatisfactory way in which they generalize. The subjects they do not like are described vaguely as "depraved," "immoral," "unwholesome," or "rotten," as the case may be. It is very seldom they come out flatfooted and mention the name of any one particular subject that is unfit for exhibition. I have no recollection of ever reading a list of film subjects that were recommended for suppression. The film critics rant in a general way about rotten pictures, condemning exhibitor and manufacturer alike, but they refuse to give him any specific instance from which he could take a lesson and mend his ways.

"A clean picture has a good lesson to it," says Mr. Poe II. There we have the vague generality again. What does he mean by a clean picture? Let us suppose that by a clean picture he means a picture with a clean motive, or a motive that is free from all indication of human passion, temptation, sin, deceit, selfishness, death, sorrow, etc. That is the kind of picture, he says, that teaches a good lesson. The only kind of a picture that could be made without those human traits would be limited comedy, a colored fairy picture, or an educational subject. Very few comedies teach any lesson at all; all fairy pictures that teach any lesson are based upon human frailty, otherwise they become mere transformation tableaux. Educational pictures are clean and teach good lessons in their way, but where is there an audience that wants educational pictures only? In other words, to teach a lesson there must be an example, and the only examples are to be found in the depiction of human weakness.

Now our critic asks us, "How many girls & boys have such rot spoiled?" How do we know? That's just what we would like to find out. So far we haven't heard of any, except in the same vague, general way that picture critics have. Much has been written about the children moving pictures have spoiled, but so far no one has come forward upon a public platform, leading a depraved, perverted child, and cried aloud, "Behold, brethren and sistern, here is little Johnnie Jones, who was ruined and debased by looking at moving pictures!" Our critics are artful dodgers when it comes to specifying names.

Mr. Poe II. says of these ruined children, "You can count them," and our answer is, We can't, we can't. Let him count them; and after they are all counted, Mr. Poe, send us your list and we will publish it along with the list of "rotten" pictures that you have in mind. HUGH F. HOFFMAN.

SELF-APPOINTED GUARDIANS.

By F. H. Richardson.

It would seem to the average man that, so long as nothing vicious be involved, it is absolutely no one's business where or how I amuse myself! This is supposed to be a land of freedom. It is supposed that so long as one does no act which is in itself injurious to the community, as such, he or she is at entire liberty to do as individual taste and inclination may direct. Theoretically, at least, no man has the right to dictate to me in anything concerning religion, including form of worship or failure to worship at all. Theoretically, at least, it is my right to do any old thing I may wish to on Sunday, or any other day, always provided the act be not one calculated to work injury in any way to the community as a whole. In past days, while men still firmly believed in witchcraft, it was considered perfectly within the rights of society, represented by the law, to force men, women and children to go to church and do other things of like nature. But with progressing years it has come to be generally recognized (or we thought it had) that church and state should and must be divorced. It has come to be an accepted fact that the matter of a man's soul is one strictly between him and his Creator and one in which the state may not in any way or manner interfere. The great cities are literally beehives of industry wherein life is lived at high tension for at least six days in the week. Six days the toiler spins, and spins so fast and so hard that there is small desire for recreation when the day's work is over. But on the seventh day, Sunday, he, or she, is released from the great industrial treadmill and may have one whole day for enjoyment. And aside from rare holidays this is pretty nearly the only playtime the city toiler has, except when too weary from a day's work to enjoy anything except a bed or an easy chair. But now come certain self-constituted guardians of the public morals (at least they ascribe their actions to a desire to improve "morals," largely) who propose to say to the great mass of toilers, that, in so far as they (the aforesaid guardians) are able to accomplish it, their amusements shall be limited on the seventh day, the day of rest, to church-going and sedate strolls in the parks—at least I haven't heard, as yet, of their attempting to close the public parks. The theaters are all to be closed hard and tight, lest the dear people be contaminated by looking at the same play that they are at liberty to look at on Monday, without the least danger of harm. How consistent! How charmingly delightful it is to be certain our "morals' are veing well looked after by certain dear individuals who are willing to do it without money and without price (?) How beautiful and satisfying to not only be able to, but obliged, to sit in the house in deep contemplation of—of—well, any old thing we may happen to have to contemplate, all day Sunday, and spend the other six days making a living, or part of one, anyhow, at hard labor. By all means shut up the theaters, especially the pernicious moving picture theaters, which put on such plays as "The Life of Moses," "The Passion Play," "Where Is My Wandering Boy To-night?" to the everlasting damnation of young and old! Shut 'em up! By all means shut 'em up! What will the people do on Sunday? Oh, let 'em stay in the house or go to church. Yes, let 'em go to church, for we, the self-appointed guardians of them, say they must—or stay at home; and verily are not we the law and the prophets? Yea, verily. Selah!

THE AGENT

DENS OF INIQUITY (?)

By F. H. Richardson.

Judge O'Sullivan, of the Court of General Sessions, has just declared the moving picture theaters to be "dens of iniquity," and made the declaration from the bench. How does the worthy Judge know? Has he been a frequenter of moving picture shows? Has he any first-hand knowledge at all? Has he been in a dozen moving picture theaters in all his life? In just what does the terrible iniquity consist? The writer has been employed in moving picture theaters for several years. He believes he is a moral man. He has four children of his own. He is free to say that he has absolutely no knowledge at all of anything iniquitous in or about moving picture theaters except that there is an occasional picture shown which portrays scenes which might well be left out. But these objectionable scenes are few and very far between nowadays and very seldom are they anything but very mildly bad. That many young girls who are habitual attendants at moving picture theaters in company with young men are led astray, may readily be granted, but if it were not the moving picture theater it would be something else, probably far worse. It is not the moving picture theater that is responsible for their downfall in any way, shape or manner, but the fact that their parents allow them to go out nights in company with callow youths; and, as I say, were they not thus attending theaters they would be somewhere else, and that somewhere else would probably be far worse and their ruin merely be accelerated. The Judge may be a very wise lawyer, but it does not follow that he is in any degree qualified to conserve the morals of the young or that he is in any degree qualified to pass upon the moral influence of the moving picture show.

Mr. James B. Smith, manager of the Majestic Theater, Talladega, Ala., writes under date of November 4, 1909, that he installed a "Hallberg" Economizer in October, which has reduced his weekly bill for electric current from $11.26 to only $4.62. He is, of course, much pleased with the "Hallberg" and says that he is advising all his friends to install the "Hallberg" Economizer, as it is a great current saver and gives a beautiful light on the sheet.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"The Lesson by the Sea" (Vitagraph).—An interesting picture, conveying, possibly, a lesson which might or might not have been intended. Anyhow it represents how a woman was unwittingly compromised through the scheming wickedness of two young men who took advantage of her. The husband, fortunately, is not unreasonable and the traducers get a sound trouncing. The film is well acted, the photography is good, there is plenty of action and the story itself is not without interest. It may suggest to those who are prone to such indulgences the dangers that exist and in addition to interesting may also exert a wholesome influence.

"The Indian Scout's Vengeance" (Kalem).—This is the second of the films released by this house in which their Indian actors are employed. It is melodramatic and the action is lively, and it tells the story of the scout's vengeance in a way that cannot be mistaken. There are the usual characters of an ungrateful Mexican, a band of cowboys who go to the rescue of a stolen girl, with a long list of exciting incidents in connection therewith. The film has many thrills and holds the interest of the audience without wavering throughout its entire length. The background is picturesque and adds much to the beauty and attractiveness of the picture. As masters of melodramatic work of a highly interesting character the Kalem company of players are to be heartily commended, and this film on the evening that we saw it in Proctor's Twenty-third street house, received the loudest kind of applause.

"Lost and Regained" (Edison).—A dramatic story based upon the loss of memory occasioned by a blow on the head. A sailor thus loses consciousness, the ship upon which he is supposed to have sailed is lost with all on board and he wanders around unknowing and unknown until a falling beam in a burning house, from which he rescues a child, hits him on the head and restores his memory. Then he is reunited with his family again. The story is simple, but its suggestions are sufficient to cause one to pause and wonder what might occur under certain circumstances. The Edison players did their parts well, but there is something about the story or the way it was interpreted that fails to make it convincing.

"That Girl of Dixon's" (Edison).—A melodrama which contains most of the qualities that go to make such dramas popular. The operation of the huge cotton compress is cleverly reproduced and introduces a new feature into a motion picture. It adds a picturesque and somewhat novel phase of scenic interest and gives a new viewpoint to those fortunate enough to see it. The acting is quite up to the standard of such dramas and the photographer has performed his part of the work well. The love story which runs through gives the necessary touch of heart interest and adds the essential human touch. It is a good story, well told in an attractive picture.

"Mexican's Faith" (Essanay).—A Western love story, with thrills enough to hold the interest of the audience and keep them wondering what is coming next. It is illustrative of a trait in the character of a Mexican which may or may not be true, but which, nevertheless, adds interest to the picture.

One objection to the film is the carrying off of a girl. It is not pleasant to see even pictured insults, and it would be quite as well for the motion picture industry, and the influence of the motion picture, if such scenes were relegated to the background along with the murders and suicides which rioted across the screens some months ago. They add no touch that is beneficial and they are distinctly objectionable to a great many people. Otherwise this film has much to commend it, in dramatic quality, acting and photography. The Essanay players have grasped the true Western spirit and have satisfactorily interpreted certain phases of plains life.

"Blue Fishing Nets" (Gaumont).—An industrial subject, illustrating certain branches of the fishing industry, which adds a good film to the industrial and educational list. The viewpoints are well chosen, yielding a picturesque reproduction, and the photography is remarkably clear and has exceptional tonal values.

"Legend of King Midas" (Gaumont).—A dramatic reproduction of the well-remembered legend which represents King Midas so unfortunate that everything he touches turns to gold. The picture is adequately reproduced and is excellent in all its details. It would be difficult indeed to improve upon the photographic quality, and the dramatic features are carefully worked out. The film should really be included under the head of educational, since it illustrates a story which is learned in the schools.

"Soul of Venice" (Vitagraph).—A dramatic picture which reproduces a love story and at the same time gives many interesting views of Venice. The last part of the picture, reproducing the vision of the young poet, is admirably staged and has little of the appearance of being plastered against the wall. Dramatically the picture is satisfactory, the players in most instances taking full advantage of the opportunities afforded by the piece and developing them admirably. Altogether this picture will rank among the best efforts of the Vitagraph house.

"Granny's Birthday" (Pathe).—A little comedy from this house which offers numerous opportunities for a laugh and succeeds admirably in performing its mission.

"In the Gulf of Salerno" (Pathe).—An admirable scenic picture, representing the beauties of this attractive locality. The selection of the viewpoints has been admirable and the resulting scenes are picturesque and attractive. Such work is to be commended because it affords opportunity for thousands of people in distant parts of the world to acquire a reasonably accurate impression of beauty spots like this, who would otherwise never know about them.

"The Final Settlement" (Biograph).—A temperance story, told with all the ability and close attention to details which mark the work of the Biograph Company. Highly dramatic in its action, the story is told in a way which makes a strong impression upon everyone who sees it. That the sight of Ruth should arouse the dormant better impulses in her former lover scarcely seems strange, yet it must be admitted that it is unusual. Nevertheless this has an element of novelty about it as shown here which adds to its interest.

"The Ranger and the Girl" (Lubin).—A picturesque, though somewhat melodramatic picture, representing the Texas Rangers, formerly as well known along the Southern border of the country as the Mounted Police are in Canada. It involves a love story, in which Capt. Carver, chief of the Rangers, and the daughter of the head smuggler are interested. There is a succession of strange mixups, but the smugglers escape and the girl offers herself as hostage to Carver, which is eagerly accepted. The acting is vigorous and there is no question about its meaning. There is, however, plenty of dramatic opportunity, which is fully developed. The Lubin players have maintained their reputation in this picture, and the operator has done his work well.

"Joseph Sold by His Brethren" (Pathe).—A satisfactory and clear interpretation of this old story. Every child knows it, and it is here presented in the beauty of Oriental color. One need not repeat it, but one may commend it as an adequate representation of a subject which appeals to all who read the Bible. The story is closely followed, since it is sufficiently dramatic in itself to hold interest without the necessity of resorting to rearrangement or additions. The whole narrative is reproduced, and so graphically is it done that a stronger impression than the mere reading was capable of producing is made upon the audience. It is an excellent Lenten subject, and churches and Sunday schools could use it with profit to themselves and benefit to their congregations.

"A Mica Mine" (Pathe).—Here is an industrial film, showing the methods of mica mining in the Ullugura mountains. It is an adequate addition to the excellent industrial series which has been brought out by the Pathes heretofore. It furnishes accurate information of a little known industry and should prove of interest to those who care for industrial or educational films. Added to this are the scenic attractions, which are wild and picturesque.

"Industries of Southern California" (Selig).—An attractive representation of the principal industries which have gone far to make Southern California famous. Not alone are the industries represented, but the picturesque scenery of that charming region is satisfactorily reproduced. It will give a new view of California and afford opportunity for many thousands of people to become acquainted with its scenery who previously comprehended but little about it.

"Nick Carter as an Acrobat" (Eclair).—Another interesting film in the Nick Carter series. This represents the original methods adopted by the famous detective in hunting down criminals. It is interesting and sufficiently melodramatic to be thrilling. The acting is in harmony with the subject.

"Castles on the Rhine" (Eclair).—Views of the castles on the famous river from Bingen to Coblenz. Not only is this picture entertaining. It possesses an important educational value. One journeys along the beautiful stream, viewing these marvelous old structures and enjoying the picturesque scenery. It is, perhaps, one of the most entertaining pictures this firm has put out. It is adequate in its representation of the subject. The operator has performed his part well, selecting the most picturesque viewpoints and illustrating the buildings to the best advantage.

"The Governor's Pardon" (Imp).—A novel subject, worked out in an intensely dramatic way. A good man takes a condemned convict's place in prison so the latter can go to see his dying wife. On his way back he is killed by an automobile. If the guard had not recognized the good man he would have been executed in the convict's place. Fortunately it all comes out right and the difficulties are swept away. The picture is strongly dramatic and the players have worked out the situations with a full appreciation of the possibilities. The acting is alive, with a comprehension of the possibilities in such a complication. The photography shows improvement over some previous films put out by this house and marks steady improvement in technical excellence.

"In the Shadow of Mt. Shasta" (Selig).—A picture which carries with it the unmistakable flavor of the West. It is a story of virile and loyal manhood and womanhood, and carries with it a conviction that one is looking at real people and learning their inmost secrets, instead of at a picture. It is acted with all the enthusiasm and fidelity to the life depicted which characterizes the work of the Selig players. The picture has the snap and dash of the spirit and the occasion which it represents.

"Ranson's Folly" (Edison).—It may appear funny under some circumstances to hold up a stage coach. In the picture here shown it would not have been so funny for Ranson if the real robber's daughter had not been in love with him The love story is the saving episode in this tragedy and supplies the necessary dramatic interest. The picture is excellent in its reproduction of frontier life, illustrating numerous features which are interesting from the scenic standpoint. apart from supplying a background for a story. The acting is admirable, and the clear tones of the photography help materially in making the picture attractive. Altogether it is a thrilling picture, representing certain phases of plains life not fully understood in many localities.

"The Vale of Aude" (Gaumont).—A beautiful and satisfactory reproduction of one of the beauty spots of the world. illustrative of the grandeur as well as delicate beauty of the scenery. Pictures like this are to be commended, since they bring to many thousands such an excellent means of seeing some of the otherwise inaccessible portions of the earth's surface, furnishing an adequate representation of scenic attractiveness. In this film the operator performed his part to perfection, selecting viewpoints which added materially to the picturesque quality of the pictures, and thereby enhancing the qualities which appeal so strongly to practically everyone who sees a truthfully rendered landscape.

"An Eye for an Eye" (Vitagraph).—A thrilling dramatic film, powerful and absorbing, holding the attention of the audience from beginning to end and presenting an illustration of the title which offers new features of absorbing interest. The dramatic qualities of the picture are well maintained, and, as the story develops, this interest increases. The tragic ending, the climax of the play, is required to complete the artistic sense of the narrative, yet sometimes one might almost wish it could be different. There is sufficient tragedy in the everyday life to make one wish it might be left out of the amusements. The acting is upon a high plane. and the photography is up to an equally high standard.

Ouchard, the Merchant (Pathe).—Condemned by sordid and ignorant persons in certain localities, this magnificent picture of Russian life is in a fair way of being missed by many devotees of moving picture art. The story in itself is sad, as any revelation of degradation and drunkenness, can not fail to be; but it is no more so than is to be found in books in the library of any household. It pictures Russian conditions, such as we have every reason to believe exist in that misruled country. What, then, it may be asked, is the excuse for exhibiting this picture of the under world to the gaze of the American public? Our answer is that it is a moral lesson of the most powerful kind. Adverse critics, who are actuated by piety or hypocrisy, may be reminded that the Meekest of Men made use of just such parables and stories in His teachings. So, in the face of all cant and prejudice, we claim for this Pathe masterpiece the highest praise for the work of the producer who managed the flawless details, the actors who so naturally filled their parts, and the photography commensurate in quality. The story, burned on the mind by the masterful presentation on the screen, cannot fail to have other than a lasting and beneficial effect upon the normal being. To those whose consceiences are scared with a conviction or knowledge of the vices depicted it will appear different—and it is only from such that we will hear objections to its exhibition.

"The District Attorney" (Lubin).—A dramatic production of unusual merit. The producers themselves say it is one of the most powerful dramatically they ever put out. The cast of characters is strong, and their interpretation of the story is so thorough that one is carried along with it irresistibly and when the climax is reached it seems almost as though one had been watching real flesh-and-blood persons. The dramatic and photographic standards are both high, while the scenic quality is quite in keeping with the character of the work. Lubin's dramas have always been good, but of late they seem to have improved and have even more of the true dramatic quality than ever before. At the same time the photography has advanced, making a combination of unusual power and one which is bringing the firm rapidly to the front as a producer of attractive films.

"Back Among the Old Folks" (Selig).—A story which will appeal with much force to those who may have had similar experiences. It seems sometimes as though much of the popularity and strength of motion pictures are due to their reproduction of scenes with which almost every individual in any audience will be more or less familiar. It was said by a competent critic that the power of the late E. P. Roe's writings was due to the fact that he made each reader think he or she was the hero or the heroine. Motion pictures are much the same. They present homely dramas in a homely way, and please an audience by their appeal to people or events whose appearance, at least, is familiar. The closer one may get to such an interpretation the stronger will be the appeal to the masses of the people. Selig seems to have reproduced this phase in a degree which shows in most of the pictures put out by the house, and this may account for a good deal of the increasing popularity of his pictures.

"Taming a Husband" (Biograph).—A story which may carry with its telling a moral of considerable force. To win back a husband's attentions by resorting to the ruse of a girl friend dressed in men's attire is a novelty that might possess some degree of usefulness in other instances of the same sort. The preparations for the duel are interesting, but when the husband breaks in and is confronted with such concrete evidence of his own negligence, the denouement is unexpected and materially adds to the dramatic qualities of the piece. Staging and acting are alike satisfactory, while the photographic quality is unquestioned.

"Violin Maker of Cremona" (Pathe).—This picture is taken from one of the most beautiful and pleasing short stories in literature, a story of love, music, skill and finally renunciation on the part of the poor hunchback. Francois Coppee never did better work than in this story, and the Pathes have reproduced it with marvelous fidelity to the strength and beauty of the original. The acting is sympathetically done, and the staging and mechanical work on the film has never been surpassed by this house. Altogether it makes a picture which will appeal directly to a large number of patrons. It deserves a long run, and undoubtedly it will receive close attention from any audience.

"The Wrestling Match" (Pathe).—A sporting picture which will please a large number who are interested in various sports, and especially to those who delight in a rugged wrestling match. The struggle of these active contestants, the play of their muscles and their generalship in securing advantage, are all admirably reproduced and increase the interest of the picture. Considering the character of the subject the pictorial work is remarkably well done.

"From Beyond Seas" (Urban).—A drama, well acted and beautifully photographed, which will interest a large number of people and add to the already enviable reputation of the producers for excellent work.

"Baby Bet" (Urban).—For those who delight in a good, active comedy, with plenty of action and a laugh in every line, this offering will satisfy. There is plenty of life, and this coupled with good photography is certain to plase a large proportion of theatergoers.

"The Newly Weds" (Biograph).—Here is one of those funny pictures which are based upon the perversity of fate and the propensity of human nature to do unintended things. To bring a man-hater and a woman-hater together and set Cupid to work in devious and wholly unexpected ways, is worthy the genius of the highest type. In this instance it has been admirably done; and when the friends of the couple begin sending congratulations and presents they seek the wisest way out of the difficulty and determine to let it go at that. The fun lies chiefly in the absurdity of the situations and the fidelity with which they are worked out. The incidental features, like the Anti-Marriage Club, add to the whimsical character of the picture and increase its picturesque and dramatic qualities. It is altogether an unusually pleasing picture.

"Rags, Old Iron!" (Essanay).—The adventures of two boys who are determined to see a certain motion picture show. The money is obtained by one selling the other for rags. Perhaps the most taking feature is the showing of a motion picture in a motion picture. It is a comedy within a comedy, and the enjoyment of the youngsters is contagious. The throwing-out process, when they inaugurate a rough-house, is very realistic. It is, perhaps, one of the most unique pictures this house has ever put out.

"The Egg Trust" (Essanay).—A comedy based upon the skyrocket price of eggs, which presents numerous novel and delightfully humorous scenes. The conception of the scenes and their working out form very humorous travesties upon the present egg situation, and represent what is perhaps one of the most astute commentaries upon the situation yet seen.

"Court Jester" (Kalem).—In this film the dwarf who made such a favorable impression in the fairy story, "The Little Old Men of the Woods," plays a prominent part, and he does it, if anything, better than he performed his earlier task. He is now playing in a well known and important theater. This is mentioned, not because that makes him any better, but because it shows in what esteem he is held in the dramatic world and is indicative of what he has accomplished. It is a strong film dramatically and represents much progress in film production on the part of this house. Their photographic department has kept pace with the dramatic end, and in this film have combined to produce a very satisfactory picture.

"The Treachery of the Pequots" (Kalem).—How well the company of Indian players employed by the Kalem people are performing their work is shown in this film. The picture is thrilling, since it represents certain phases of Indian life very graphically. Further, it is of historic value, since it illustrates an episode in American history which is not thoroughly understood by all. Along with these go a novel and amusing comedy which adds to the attractiveness of the entire composition. It is a successful Indian picture and one that will have a strong appeal for a large number of theater patrons. The producers deserve congratulations for their excellent work.

"Death of Minnehaha" (Imp).—The good work of the Imp players in their former scene from "Hiawatha" has been improved upon in this film, not only dramatically, but scenically and photographically. Sometimes not all the apparent errors are due to the producers. A careless operator, poor projection or a dozen other influences may combine to injure the appearance of a film on the screen, even after the producer has done his best. The dramatic possibilities of all of "Hiawatha" are great, and perhaps with the exception of "The Famine," this one is the strongest in the poem. The players have performed their parts well. There may be touches here and there which could be strengthened, but as a whole a reasonably satisfactory production has been given. The suggestion is offered that further scenes from this same story be dramatized, making them into a connected series which will place the poem in graphic form and will make it useful for educational as well as for entertainment purposes.

"The Cowboy and the Schoolmarm" (Bison).—A thrilling Western melodrama, sympathetically acted by the Bison stock company now in the West. It has all the accompaniments to give it the requisite atmosphere and the action leaves nothing to be desired in the way of movement and thrills. It is the old story of jealousy, the capture of a girl by a band of ruffians, the warning to her lover by friendly Indians, with a long chase and the discomfiture of the gang. It is all interesting except the carrying away of the girl, or the forcing of the girl to ride ahead of the ruffians. It seems as though the bald representation of these rough, and indirectly suggestive scenes could be omitted without detriment to the picture. They could be suggested in some way, which would be better and would not detract from the interest. This criticism is not offered to detract from the merit of the work this company is doing; and its steady improvement, both dramatically and photographically, is fully recognized. But to depend upon the minute rendering of melodramatic details to sustain the picture is the lowest form of art and not the kind which appeals to a very large and growing proportion of theatergoers.

"Dooley Referees the Big Fight" (Bison).—Another laughable picture in the Dooley series. It may be that his methods as referee would scarcely stand the test of the rules which usually govern in such instances, but, anyhow, there is a laugh in every motion, and that, after, all, is the essential part of the picture. The bigger the travesty on the rules the more fun it makes, hence the picture is successful.

"Iron Arm's Remorse" (Pantograph).—A Western story of strong action based upon the love of an Indian for a white girl. There is a dishonest character in the play who takes all the income of a mine and allows the rightful owner to be dispossessed when the mine is producing thousands. There is a thrilling chase after a fight in a barroom in which the Indian gets a part of the gold and flees. He is captured, but escapes and succeeds in getting the gold to its rightful owners, and then he plunges into the forest and disappears. The writer does not remember seeing any of this firm's work before, and finds much to commend in this film. The action is good, and the photography in the main is quite satisfactory, though here and there weak places appear in the film. These could be easily remedied, however, and the remainder of the picture is sufficiently good to warrant it. If such pictures as this are released there will be no question about the value and interest of the service.

"Count of Monte Christo" (Challenge).—The writer does not remember seeing any previous film under this trademark, excepting possibly some short skits of the humorous order. Here, however, is an ambitious work, an attempt to condense

Dumas' great novel into 1,000 feet, or less, of motion picture film. In most particulars the work has been well done. Perhaps the principal criticism is with the principal character, Edmond Dantes. He does not seem to rise to the opportunities of his part, especially in the dungen, where the dramatic possibilities are great. Obviously in one film it is possible to touch only upon the main points of the story, but in the main these are well chosen. One can acquire a reasonably accurate impression of the story by seeing the picture, or, at least, the main features of it. The photographic qualities are good, and the viewpoints are chosen with discretion. Where the body is thrown into the sea the view is a strong picture. The producer should be more careful with the spelling on his sub-titles. It makes a bad impression to see poor spelling and in some instances worse English on the sub-titles. The defects in this film could be easily remedied and it would then appeal to an even larger clientele with more certainty of success.

"The Golf Mania" (Lux).—All sorts of crazes beset unfortunate men; but in the instance here illustrated the mania for golf besets both father and mother and the results are disastrous, but extremely funny. While this type of comedy is a bit rough and coarse, it is sufficient to make patrons laugh, and this is the main point in the matter. It is well acted, and in the main adequately photographed.

"The Sailor's Dog" (Lux).—A pretty story of the sagacity of a dog. He assists in the capture of some thieves and recovers the stolen property, a bag of valuable letters, of which his master was robbed. Films which represent the sagacity of any animal are always interesting and always hold the attention of the audience. Something about such exhibitions appeals with especial strength and in nearly all instances bring hearty applause. The photography is clear and good.

"Two Mothers" (Ambrosio).—A strongly dramatic subject, sympathetically acted, representing the patriotism of two mothers, which leads them even unto death. The subject is decidedly heavy, yet it is admirably acted and clearly photographed. Occasionally only is a weak spot discoverable in the acting, and then it passes almost before it is realized, while the tendency is toward a higher plane in both acting and pictorial quality.

"Foolshead at the Ball" (Itala).—Another picture in this popular series. Foolshead's adventures are laughable enough to create a roar everywhere, and his experiences at this ball are no exception to the rule. The acting shows improvement and the photography is clearer than some which has gone before. The steady improvement in this firm's work is a feature well worth noting.

"The Dog of the Cheese Monger" (Itala).—A comedy with a rather novel subject, well acted and carefully staged. The picture will attract because it represents certain humorous phases which have not heretofore been overdone. The photography is clear, too, a consideration of importance.

"The Mysterious Track" (Ambrosio).—A humorous illustration of the devious way a detective was led in his attempts to run down a criminal. He was an amateur, and his efforts to make a capture, with his numerous blunders, constitute a very funny series of pictures, a fitting relief from some of the heavier work which has gone before in the program.

"A Vindictive Foreman" (Nestor).—Here is a picture which calls for dramatic skill, and the principal character in the piece performs his part admirably. The story ends right, a feature which undoubtedly strengthens its appeal. A considerable proportion of the patrons of a theater like to see an ending in which the difficulties are all adjusted and the unfortunate are made happy. The Nestor people have gauged their public rightly in the ending of their thrilling pictures

"Mother Love" (Imp).—If the "Imp" continues to give us pictures of the kind and quality of "Mother Love" the independent exhibitors will not lack headliners for their programs. While the theme is not new, it is one which presents the opportunity for powerful dramatic effect and calls for the best efforts of the actors. And in all fairness to the "Imp" performers it must be said that they have made the most of their opportunity. "Mother Love" is a film that brings honor to the producer and it will bring dollars to the exhibitor Seldom, if ever, have we seen a similar subject better handled. A young mother loses her reason through the death of her child and regains it when her husband replaces it with an adopted baby of strong resemblance. The attending circumstances are skillfully worked out and the film received the breathless attention and applause of the house in which we saw it.

GOERZ LENSES FOR MOVING PICTURE CAMERAS.

Goerz lenses for stationary photography have enjoyed many years of well deserved reputation. We, who write this article, used one of the earliest double anastigmat lenses made by the firm in Berlin some fifteen or sixteen years ago. That was about the time when lens makers began to introduce lenses for the purpose of giving the photograph even and uniform definition throughout; while at the same time the lens had a large aperture, thus admitting of greater rapidity of working. Before then, it was necessary—and here we are writing rather broadly—in order to get perfect definition over the surface of a photograph with the lens then made to use a small aperture. Simply because the lens suffered from two defects, namely, curvature of field and astigmatism. The practical outcome of these optical defects was this: that when you used a large aperture in taking the photograph, the sides of the picture were slightly out of focus or blurred.

Those of our readers who are conversant with the economics of stationary photography will bear us out in this comparison between the older form of lens and the new. Goerz was one of those who by the aid of specially prepared glass first made what are known as anastigmat lenses. For ordinary photography those lenses enjoyed a very great reputation on account of these fine optical qualities. What applies to stationary photography has applied and is applying to moving picture photography. In many cases the lens for taking the moving picture is not of the best optical quality The result is seen by eyes like our own, which are trained by experience to look at moving pictures from the technical standpoint. The photographs are not so well defined as they might be or could be. There is not sufficient depth of definition and occasionally the definition at the sides of the picture is not so good as the definition at the center. It all comes to this: that the picture on the screen under its very high degree of magnification does not present that sharpness of definition it might.

The reader will see from this that there is a great deal dependent upon the quality of the lens for taking the moving picture. The pictures made by some of the leading manufacturers prove this. They vary perceptibly, although not fatally, in photographic qualities. And it is easy for those conversant with the matter to pick out those pictures which are made with the highest class of lens. Only the other day we were speaking to the technical manager of a film producing firm and we were complimenting him upon the fine photographic qualities of his pictures. His reply was: "I have a very good lens." We may also quote an experience anterior to this. Something like eighteen months ago we were personally asked by a responsible employee of a noted film manufacturing house for information as to the lens used by a rival film maker. He had used all the lenses commercially available in this country, and yet had to confess that he was unable to get the results of the rival house. We gave him the necessary information and the result was that lenses of very high grade were introduced for the work and the work at once began to show improvement. Indeed, if we were to mention the name of the pictures our readers, like ourselves, would be wise as to cause and effect.

This brings us to an announcement that we are pleased to make, namely, that the C. P. Goerz American Optical Company, of 79 East 130th street, New York City, are introducing lenses especially designed for the taking of moving pictures. Comparatively few of the world's opticians make lenses especially for the moving picture. The reason for this is obvious. The demand is not overwhelmingly great, and also the lenses have to be specially computed and constructed. Possibly hitherto, to put it in plain English, it has not been worth the while of the manufacturing optician to turn his attention to this branch of work. But we now perceive a change. The growth of the moving picture industry is such that not only in this country but in others there is a demand for lenses especially made—that is, especially computed and constructed for moving picture work. Into the scientific aspects of the matter it is not necessary for us to enter; suffice it to say that each type of lens for photographic purposes that is put on the market is the result of special mathematical calculations and constructional details. A lens making factory is one of the most interesting branches of industry one could desire to see, as the work has to be carried out with great delicacy, accuracy and thoroughness.

With regard to the Goerz lens for moving pictures the technical data supplied are as follows: The lens is what is known as of the uncemented type, consisting of four single lenses, two in the front of the tube, two in the rear, with the diaphragm in the center. It is of 2⅜ inches equivalent focus working at the very high maximum speed of F 3.5. Yet, notwithstanding this great rapidity, the standard size of film, that is 1¼ inches by ¾ of an inch, is covered with the most critical definition. The price of the lens is $36. This lens has been supplied to leading manufacturers, such as the Edison Manufacturing Company, Lubin, Selig and others. It is sent out in regular standard barrels with Iris diaphragms, but C. P. Goerz American Optical Company are prepared to make focusing jackets to the special order of the customer.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

On March 12 "Taming a Grandfather" will be placed at the disposal of those who know a good thing when they see it, a comedy of charming scintillations of pathos and humor It is a delight and a joy, keeping everybody good natured and happy throughout the entire performance.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" will be the real thing in every respect, real ice, real bloodhounds, real negroes, real actors and real scenes from real life as it really was in the antebellum days. Reproducing things in realistic reality with all the beauty and sentiments of the early nineteenth century, a wonderful and magnificent endorsement of the Vitagraph's claims of "life portrayals."

"The Broken Spell," a Vitagraphic gem which will appear the latter part of March, is a modern society drama with a Shakespearian embellishment delineated in a dream, indescribably ingenuous in its motive and construction. An especial feature of extraordinary beauty and fascination. A story with an impetus of thought of priceless value, a woman saved from her own frailty through a vision of its consequences.

This acknowledgment from Keewanee, Ill., speaks volumes for the Vitagraph Company's great achievement, "The Life of Moses":

"I have just completed the last reel of 'The Life of Moses' and the only fault I find is that the capacity of my small theater seats 200, but with the music of the piano, the singing of sacred songs, this picture and the excellent lecture, my business was great. I only wish I had the financial backing to have the entire five reels on the road with my able assistants. CHRIS TAYLOR."

EDISON NOTES.

In "Fruit Growing, Grand Valley, Col.," the Edison Company has produced a film which, in addition to serving as a pleasing relief to any audience from the conventional run of subjects, will undoubtedly win the admiration of the many educators throughout the country who are just now agitating the movement for the introduction of educational films in the public schools. The film is splendidly conceived and assembled.

As if in a train the audience is carried through huge stretches of dry, arid plains and mountainous country when, just as the eye is about to become wearied from gazing upon so much desolation and barrenness, there burst into view magnificent orchards of trees fairly groaning under their plenteous burden of luscious fruit—apple and pear orchards through which course at regular intervals small streams or ducts, by which the country has been reclaimed from its barrenness. The ingenuity of man and the result of the application of scientific methods to the cultivation of fruit are graphically shown in the pictures. The entire process of irrigation—the great wheel by which the water is lifted above its level and distributed to the division boxes, from which it is conveyed to the irrigating ducts—the operation of spraying the trees to rid them of injurious insects, the precaution taken to protect the fruit from sudden frost, by the lighting of alcohol fires in the "streets"—one scene showing the fruit farmers aroused at night and hurriedly distributing themselves to the orchards for that purpose—and finally the care used in picking and packing the fruit for shipment are clearly conveyed to the audience through the medium of splendid photography.

The humorous incidents with which "A Mountain Blizzard"—released March 15—begins are forgotten as the three tenderfeet, benighted in the raging storm, cold and despairing of succor, lie down to die after a pathetic farewell and a renunciation of their favorite vices. The dramatic effect is swiftly changed to comedy, however, when restored to consciousness by rescuers from the nearby hotel, which was obscured from their vision in the storm, and stimulated by the warmth and good cheer found within, each one promptly forgets his peril of a few hours before and, regretting the renunciation made in the prospects of a safe ticket to eternity, stealthily seeks and recovers the symbol of his favorite vice. The big laugh of the film is when the three simultaneously discover one another giving free rein to his ruling passion.

Through the courtesy of H. A. Daniels, the popular manager, a demonstration of the new Model "B" Kinetoscope was given at Keith's Hippodrome, Cleveland, Ohio, on February 22. Over two hundred invitations were sent out to exhibitors in and about Cleveland and the attendance was most gratifying. Arrangements for the demonstration were made by E. Mandelbaum, of the Lake Shore Film and Supply Company, which exchange, as well as the United Film Exchange, was represented. F. B. Baily, of the Montana Film Exchange, was also among those present. As a result of the demonstration the Edison Company, through its representative, received a number of good orders.

The Keith Hippodrome is one of the finest and largest places of amusement in the country, its seating capacity of 4,500 being second only to that of the New York Hippodrome. It was recently secured by George Kleine for an exhibition of educational films to which the prominent educators, ministers, professional men and city officials of Cleveland are to be invited.

Trent & Wilson, who recently took the agency for Edison products in Salt Lake City, have installed two new Model "B" machines in the Luna Theater and one in the Casino Theater of that city. The Luna and Casino are considered two of the largest and best equipped places of amusement in the West. The latter is a combination motion picture and vaudeville house, recently erected and conducted along strictly up-to-date lines.

ESSANAY NOTES.

G. M. Anderson, the Essanay's Western producer, who is now making pictures in Santa Barbara, Cal., tells a funny incident in the making of the Essanay's recent educational and novelty picture, "The Ostrich and the Lady." The camera man was invited to stand his tripod in the center of the field, right among the birds. He had been told that they were harmless as doves. The keeper was seeking to put the black bag over one of the ostrichs' heads when it backed into the camera and with a vicious movement of one of its feet, sent the camera and operator sprawling. The frightened camera man, seizing his instruments, hurried out of the enclosure and finished taking the picture from without. He was later invited to take a close-up view of other features, only obtainable by entering the enclosure, but he turned away with the remark, "Not for muh!"

The Essanay's London office has now removed from 5 New Compton street, W. C., to 4 Rupert street, in more capacious quarters. Mr. Spoor writes that the American manufacturers are all enjoying huge prosperity in the foreign fields.

The Essanay's latest Western picture, "The Fence on Bar Z Ranch," is a feature for Saturday, March 12. The story tells of a controversy over a boundary line dividing the properties of Phillip Graham, a wealthy ranchman, and a widow. In the end the disputed fence is done away with entirely, and the two properties with the two hearts are made into one. The picture contains some splendid dramatic situations which are cleverly acted.

LUBIN NOTES.

Judging from the advance orders for extra prints, the Lubin release for St. Patrick's Day is going to be the most popular production made in some time. The story is one that is available long after the day of release, since it does not hinge upon St. Patrick's Day, but wide-awake exhibitors realize that the title in front of their house on March 17 will augment business and make new friends and patrons The best part of it is that the release is not only timely but a particularly good bit of work both as regards acting and scenic presentation.

Experiments were made the other day and it was found that in the new Lubin studio twelve of fourteen regulation sets can be made at once, enough to permit the players in a production to complete the interior action of any picture in a single day, keeping in the atmosphere of the story as is not possible in the delays while scenes are being struck and others set.

Some authors who write motion pictures seem to believe that all things are possible to the trick photographer. The other day a manuscript was submitted calling for two areoplanes, a dirigible balloon and a couple of submarine boats, one of which was to be rammed by the other under water. It could have been done, at that, but having planned a lot of big effects, the author carelessly forgot to write a story about it.

NESTOR FILM NOTES.

Something novel in the way of a plot is coming in the next release announced "The Silver Lining," a story of exceptionally strong heart interest, in which an intercepted letter figures; it is cut in half and the portion forwarded, while apparently complete in itself, conveys an entirely different meaning to that intended by the writer.

The great demand for Western subjects has induced this company to engage Nebraska Bill's troupe of cowboys for the production of their subjects on a contract for six months, and the comments heard about their wonderful riding in "In Arizona" is very flattering to the producers.

BISON NOTES.

The leading members of the Bison stock company are now in the Southwest, producing new subjects for the New York Motion Picture Company. In the past four months the company has produced more subjects of "life on the plains" than any other company in the country, and attained phenomenal success by producing such pictures as the "Ten of Spades," "Young Deer's Gratitude," and in the near future "The Man from Texas" will be released, which is calculated to be the triumph of all Western subjects.

The Thread of Destiny

A STORY OF THE OLD SOUTHWEST

There is always a fascination in scenes of a Latin-American type, and in this Biograph subject are shown a succession of Southern Californian views that are decidedly picturesque, at the same time unfolding a most interesting story of the lands of the old Missions. The orphan girl of San Gabriel meets and is attracted by a Spanish stranger. The Spaniard later is falsely accused of cheating at cards, and would have suffered lynching had it not been for the girl's ruse, who not only saves his life but yields to his pleading and becomes his bride. The last scene shows them leaving the old mission at twilight after the old priest has made them one.

In Old California

A ROMANCE OF THE SPANISH DOMINION

The story told in this Biograph subject is of the early days of Southern California before and after Mexican independence was proclaimed. A young Mexican girl rejects her Spanish suitor in favor of a handsome young Mexican troubadour, only to rue it, for her husband proves to be a disreputable wretch. Twenty years later we find her in profound distress as to the future of her young son. The father's conduct being anything but exemplary, she intercedes with her former sweetheart, who is now Governor, and he takes him into his army. Here the blood of the father is evident in the son, for he is a born profligate. Still, the Governor keeps this from the mother, who dies believing her son a hero.

THE RIGHT DECISION—The story begins with a prologue showing the battlefield of Waterloo in the cold gray of the morning after. We see a wounded Captain of the French Army recovering consciousness while his pockets are being rifled. He unsuspiciously takes the thief for a rescuer and, when he finds his money gone, makes good his determination to reward his saviour by writing an acknowledgment of the debt on his cuff, which he presents to the scoundrel.

The story proceeds with a scene a few years later where, on the deathbed of this same Captain, he charges his son to search for and reward the possessor of this cuff. By a trick of fate the son, reduced to poverty, occupies a garret adjoining that of the thief, now a beggar as well, who still retains the cuff. The Captain's son has fallen in love with a beautiful girl whom he does not know but whom he has watched in the park and at church with her aged father. Solicited for alms, this girl and her father come to the house, and the father ascends to the adjoining garret to carry food to the unworthy beggar before mentioned. This villain, knowing in advance of the contemplated visit, has conspired with several of his pals to seize the old man, rob him, and hold him for ransom. The Captain's son has overheard the plot without knowing who was to be the victim, and has arranged to give the chief of police a signal when the time is ripe for capturing the entire gang.

Looking through a chink in the wall, preparatory to giving this signal, he sees the thief, in a moment of boastfulness, produce the cuff and declare himself its rightful possessor. The young man is torn between the thought of his father's command and the danger of the beautiful girl and her father. Instead of giving the signal to the police, he dashes into the room and attempts to rescue the girl and her father single-handed. Of course he is overpowered, but the valiant inspector, who has not waited for the signal, arrives in the nick of time to save the lovers and the old man and to arrest the villains.

MY MILLINER'S BILL.—A young wife, whose husband took her from the life of the theater, has a weakness for hats which she simply cannot overcome, and her milliner's bills, in consequence, climb steadily to dizzy altitudes far beyond the reach of her husband's pocketbook. He is a good-humored chap, very much in love with his pretty wife and apparently unsuspicious of her extravagance, but with one weakness—he believes himself an exceptional amateur actor. When the milliner, weary of making many requests for payment of her bills without satisfactory response, finally threatens the young wife with a lawsuit and she writes to a friend for a loan sufficient to cover the bill, she incautiously makes the statement that her husband does not suspect her predicament, for "he is no actor and would show it if he did." When the note accidentally falls into his hands his pride is piqued, and we see him later, seated before his mirror, making himself up into an elderly process server and appear before the young wife with a demand for settlement of the lengthy bill. As she cannot settle he proceeds to attach the furniture, with the result that about everything of value in the room is tagged, to the dismay of the wife, who is almost on the verge of hysterics.

Now she had refused to dance for him the night before because she was cross and frightened by the milliner's threats, and when she now asks him how she can evade the law's demands he remembers and offers to forego his business if she will dance for him. Refusing at first, she at last reluctantly consents. The dance is prettily performed, and when he has won this point he removes the false beard and makes himself known to her. Of course she is furious, but her anger is mollified when he flashes in her face the lengthy milliner's bill. This time, however, it is receipted, and the scene ends with the two in each other's arms wrapped round and round with the lengths of the milliner's bill.

HIS FIRST VALENTINE.—"Easy" Miller, a brawny young prospector in the mountains of Placer County, California, falls in love with the new school teacher, Miss Dorothy Clark. His first meeting with her is on a winter's day when she is among the children in the school yard near the roadside. He attempts to address her, but is politely repulsed. Nothing daunted, he dresses in his best and on a later day visits the school. He has the courage to enter, but after meeting Miss Clark he loses his volubility and makes a bashful exit without any satisfactory results. His good fortune dawns when, passing the school one day, he is able to assist the young lady in adjusting the stirrup on her horse's saddle. From this time forth he becomes one of her many suitors. He is so bashful that he despairs of being able to declare himself, but one evening while visiting the Clark home he accidentally knocks over an album in which Mrs. Clark, the mother of the heroine, has kept for years a valentine sent to her by her husband, now dead. Mrs. Clark explains to "Easy" the meaning of a valentine—something he had never before heard of. A great idea now enters his mind and a great light fills his soul. He resolves then and there to send a valentine to Dorothy.

He writes to a machinery concern in San Francisco, with which he had done business, and requests them to send the precious token addressed to Miss Dorothy Clark, George's Flat, Placer County, Cal. His wish is carried out, but on the morning of Valentine's Day, when the mail is due, the stage driver dashes up to the post office on one of the leaders and informs those grouped about, including "Easy," that he stage has been held up. "Easy" is possessed of but one thought—that of getting the valentine and delivering it to Miss Clark's home before the day has passed. He joins the sheriff's posse, disagrees with the sheriff as to the route the robbers have taken and follows his own ideas, which act brings him upon the outlaws. A desperate fight ensues in which he is severely wounded. Notwithstanding his condition, he struggles back with the precious valentine in his arm and, though urged by his comrades to go directly to his cabin, insists on personally delivering it to the home of Miss Clark. How "Easy" is rewarded for his chivalrous daring is shown in the happy ending.

LOVE DROPS.—A young man calls on his sweetheart, whose stern and grouchy father has forbidden her to receive the attentions of this particular lover. Because she is told to do so and is aware that she is watched by papa, she rejects the ardent suitor. The latter, realizing "that faint heart ne'er won fair lady," consults a fortune teller, who prescribes love drops. He purchases some from her and sends them to the object of his affections. Papa is in a grouchy mood at the dinner table when the love drops, in the shape of a box of candy, arrive. He snatches them from his daughter's hands and eats some with marvelous results. The young man calls to find that while his package has missed the mark it has nevertheless accomplished the desired result, for papa is gradually transformed from a pessimistic "grouch" to an optimistic lover of the universe. His actions at this point produce the happy ending and the big laugh of the picture.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

THE OSTRICH AND THE LADY.—The film pictures scenes on a big ostrich farm in Southern California, near Los Angeles. A large flock of several hundred of the big birds are seen feeding. They are coaxed up close to the camera by the keeper and we are offered a close-up view of the long necked fellows.

The films show how the birds are caught for preening. A bag, resembling an ordinary stocking, is put over their heads, after which they can be easily managed. Everyone is familiar with that absurd ostrich trait of hiding its head in the sand to elude capture. The bird seems to imagine that if it's head is hidden the hunters will be unable to find it. Ostrich hunting, on account of this foolishness, is tame sport.

Not altogether tame, however, because the ostrich is as handy with its feet as a mule. Its kick has often dealt death to the hunter.

The film also shows the keeper picking the valuable ostrich feathers. The ostrrich plume is the most expensive of all bird feathers and there is a great profit in raising ostriches. There are several large ostrich farms in Southern California.

The picture closes with a little novelty. First is shown a large hat entirely hidden beneath ostrich plumes. The hat slowly rises, disclosing a pretty face and laughing eyes.

"Just send the bill to my husband," she seems to say.

THE RANCHGIRL'S LEGACY.—Jack Tyler, a handsome young Boston youth, receives a letter from his attorneys, Post & Post, that his uncle, a Western ranchman, has died and that he is one of the heirs of the $1,000,000, left by his uncle. This part of it is very good but the condition prescribed in the will is not so agreeable, because the whimsical old uncle has stipulated that he is to receive his portion of the inheritance, providing he marry his uncle's niece, Miss Carrie Perkins, of Chimney Gulch, Ariz. The uncle further sets forth the statement that if he refuses to marry Miss Perkins the entire inheritance will go to her.

A similar letter is later delivered to Miss Carrie. The uncle makes a similar statement, that if she refuses to marry Jack Taylor she will lose her share of the inheritance. It is a case of whoever refuses, loses.

Jack is not at all happy over the matrimonial clause in the will, nor is Miss Perkins. However, Jack decides to visit Chimney Gulch and find out what sort of a girl Miss Carrie is.

When he lands in the Western town he takes a room at the hotel and endeavors to find some scheme to get him out of the difficulty. Finally, a good idea comes to him. If he can disgust the girl in some way, perhaps she will refuse to marry him. Thus he will receive the entire fortune.

The same thought has come to Carrie and when Jack, dressed as the silliest sort of a fop of the cane and eyeglass variety, raps at the door, Carrie, togged out in exaggerated Western clothes and garnished with revolvers and horse pistols, opens the door and falls into his arms.

Jack is given a taste of Western life when Carrie and a number of cowboys make him do a jig to the crack of their Colts while the dust flies about his feet.

After this little excitement Carrie slaps him on the back and takes him off to a deserted spot where they can spoon without being seen. She tries all sorts of nonsense to make Jack disgusted while he acts his silliest and seems very much upset by the girl's strenuous love making.

In the end Jack is forced to sign a note in which he states that he refuses to marry Carrie Perkins and thus forfeits his claim on the fortune. The girl goes away satisfied.

A few days later something happens to bring them together. Carrie has abandoned her outlandish costume and Jack has removed his toupee and eyeglass. Carrie has a cowboy admirer, Jack Gleason, who, since he has learned of Carrie's inheritance, has made love to the girl. She does not care for him and when he meets her accidentally in a secluded spot on the ranch she tells him flatly that she will not marry him. Gleason insults the girl and endeavors to take her in his arms.

Jack Tyler wanders on the scene, sees the girl struggling in the arms of the cowboy and runs to her rescue. Gleason is knocked down and sneaks away. The two heirs recognize each other.

A little love scene follows and Carrie tears up the note of forfeit given her by Jack and stretches out her hand. Jack takes her in his arms and presses a kiss to her lips as the picture closes.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

MARRIAGE IN HASTE.—The course of true love never did run smooth, but the chart of the love affairs of Arthur and Jean suggested a corkscrew with the cramps, for not only did father object but he objected with an emphasis that resulted in Jean being locked in her room while Arthur was forbidden the house. But Jean was a chip of the old block and she had all of her father's temper and determination and her woman's wit besides.

There were two keys to the door of her boudoir and as soon as father went away she opened the door with the second and dispatched the maid with a note to Arthur, promising to elope with him the following morning.

She kept the appointment and sent a note to her father by a little girl who chanced by. The child delivered the note and father excelled all previous exhibitions of rage when he read the brief lines. Warning the Chief of Police of the elopement and asking that the rural constables be requested to hold the elopers, father took the little girl as guide and set out in his own car in pursuit. That warning was a boomerang for father, for the Mayor of Cragg Crossing got one of the messages and proceeded to hold up all cars from the city on general principles. Father, with the little girl still his companion, was one of the catches and the extreme youth of the child convinced the rural populace that hanging was about seven degrees too good for father. They got a rope around father's neck and prepared to launch him into eternity. Jean and Arthur arrived in time to explain matters, but father was so angry with the inhabitants of Cragg Crossing that he had no time to be angry with Jean and his new son-in-law.

HEARTS ARE TRUMP.—Hearts are always trump in the game of life, though sometimes it seems that diamonds stand the better suit. Robert Geddes has a pretty daughter, Ruth, who is loved by George Drake, his paymaster, and Joe Brooks, a young civil engineer, employed on the big railroad contract that is the immediate interest of Geddes & Co. Geddes rather favors Drake because the latter is a business man, but Ruth's preference is for Brooks, for she has taken an instinctive dislike to Drake, though she herself is scarcely conscious of this fact. Drake rides out to the construction camp to pay off the men and Ruth and her father go along. Drake takes a dislike to Brooks because of Ruth's preference for the young engineer, and this is fanned into hatred by later slights. There is an altercation that marks the climax of the hatred and Ruth's mistrust of Drake turns to disgust. Drake sees that he has lost and plans to steal the payroll and leave the country. But the thief is himself robbed by the mulatto foreman of the gang of negro track layers and is left insensible on the road. He charges Brooks with being the man who planned the robbery and the Sheriff takes him into custody. Then a search is instituted for the others and the foreman is run down and apprehended. Brooks is freed from the suspicion and Drake shares prison quarters with the negro.

Her pure soul goes out in love to the trees, the flowers and the sun, which is responded in the exhilaration of their perfume. Yet she is obsessed with an insatiable yearning. LOVE DROPS whom she can evince her generous, affectionate nature, the wife of the innkeeper, who is ill. Each morning she gathers flowers and brings them to her. On this morning we see her flower-laden, making her way to the inn. On the road she meets a Mexican stranger, Estrada. Their hands touch while he assists her in recovering some of the flowers she has dropped. She experiences a thrill, such as she had never felt before, and yet she doesn't know why. However, her heart seems lighter, the world brighter, as she continues on to the inn to cheer and comfort the suffering woman. As she is about to leave, she is insulted with the advances of Gus Walters, a drunken tough. He is about to seize her when Estrada enters and rescues her from the peril, seeing her safely out of the place. Later, Estrada is induced to take a hand in a poker game, which is really a subterfuge to start a quarrel. He is accused of cheating, and they determine to lynch him. Seeing the chances extremely against him, he picks up a chair, and whirling it around him, makes his way to the door. He dashes down the road, and by climbing a tree, manages to throw his pursures off his trail. In detour he finally comes to a cabin, which he enters as refuge, to find it the home of Myrtle. Her wit saves him. She makes him bind her hands and feet, disarrange the place, and then hide under a pile of stuff. The appearances are convincing to the story she tells the posse of being robbed by Estrada, who had proceeded on out of reach. They are satisfied that the Mexican has eluded them and so search no further, going back to the inn. Gus hangs back and returns to Myrtle's cabin to wreak revenge, thinking she is unprotected, but he is mistaken, of course, and being off guard, he is easily overpowered and bound. He is afforded the felicity of witnessing Myrtle and Estrada plight their troth, and leave for the mission chapel to be married. Still they are charitable, for before they leave they place in Gus' mouth a cigarette and light it for him that his hours of bondage might not hang heavy. Off they go to the mission where they are bound for life in holy marriage. Gus, meanwhile, has freed himself and rushing back to the inn tells of the girl's ruse. As they look from the window they see Myrtle and Estrada leaving the priest and strolling down the road as the twilight bells of the Angelus toll. This awakens the boys to their better selves and they exclaim, "Let 'em go, Gus, the drinks are on you."

A short but very laughable film, which shows the startling effect a box of candy ("Love Drops") purchased from a fortune teller had upon a "grouchy" father. This film will get the big "laughs" wherever it is shown.

IN OLD CALIFORNIA.—This story starts some time before Mexican independence was proclaimed in California, which occurred in 1822. Perdita Arguello, the pretty Spanish senorita, is beloved by Jose Manuella, a wealthy young Spaniard, who has migrated to the new world in search of adventure. A man of fine qualities, he surrenders claim upon the girl when he finds her heart given to Pedro Cortes, a handsome troubadour of the village. Cortes is just the sort of fellow to impress a thoughtless unsophisticated girl with his gentle persuasive manner, together with his talents as a musician. Of a poetic temperament, she yields to his plea and marries him. But what a calamity! Twenty years later we see the result of her folly. Cortes has proved to be a worthless dipsomaniac and reprobate, spending his time and the money she earns at the tavern. The most unfortunate feature is that they have a son, now nearly nineteen years old. Perdita realizes that the environs and example of the father are not favorable to the boy's well being, hence she resolves to save him. It is at a time when Baja and Alta California are in conflict, and Manuella, Perdita's former lover, is now Governor, so she appeals to him to provide a future for her son. The Governor takes the boy into his own company. But is there any wonder that the son of such a dog as Cortes should prove himself to be a despicable whelp? He is not long in the service when the blood of his father asserts itself. Drunkenness is one of the first offenses. Next theft of the meanest order, that of robbing his sleeping comrades in arms. Perdita has despatched a letter of thanks to the Governor, which he is reading as the drunken boy is brought before him. The tone of the letter induces Manuella to be easy with the boy that she might live in ignorance of his real nature. However, later she writes that she is dying and believing her son has made a name for himself, she asks to be allowed to see him before she dies. As the Governor reads this letter the boy is brought before him, having been caught thieving. Manuella is thoroughly disgusted with the boy, but in order to have his mother die happy, he decorates him, making him appear before her as a hero. When she breathes her last the medals are torn from his breast and he is sent to prison where the punishment he justly deserves is inflicted.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

AN EYE FOR AN EYE.—The plot of the story is laid in two countries, Italy and America. An Italian carpenter has a wife very much younger than himself. They are very happy until a young mechanic attracts the attention of the wife and makes love to her. She becomes dissatisfied with her husband and longs for the society of the young man. The young fellow receives a letter calling him to New York City and he induces the young wife to run away with him to America.

The husband returns to their little cottage as usual after his hard day's work, expecting to meet his wife and instead finds a note explaining that she has fled with the young mechanic. He immediately decides to arrange his affairs and follow the pair.

In New York, the young mechanic has grown tired of the carpenter's wife and neglects her for a young waitress in an Italian restaurant. The old carpenter who has arrived in New York goes to this restaurant and while there the young mechanic has called to see the waitress and follows her into the kitchen, embraces her and is caught by the discarded woman who pounces upon the waitress.

The young Italian seizes his forsaken victim and strangles her. The patrons of the restaurant among whom is the carpenter, hear the call for help and rush into the kitchen. The old man recognizes his erring wife and carries her tenderly to her lodgings. He forgives all and she passes away quietly.

Scarcely has she died when the wrecker of her life comes into the room. The two men glare at each other, at the instant of recognition, they are engaged in deadly struggle. The old man strangles his wife's traducer to death.

Returning to his native land the old man buries his wife among the scenes of her childhood in Sunny Italy.

ON THE BORDER LINE.—Here we have a picture of a happy home, a loving husband, a devoted wife and little daughter. The husband leaves the house; he is no sooner gone when the wife receives a letter from her brother whom she has not seen for years, saying that he is coming to see her and the family and will probably arrive as soon as the letter. The husband is well on his way to the office when rain begins to fall and he is reminded that he has forgotten his umbrella and returns home to get it.

When he reaches the house he glances in the window and sees his wife in the embrace of her brother, whom he does not recognize, and becoming jealous and suspicious, he does not wait for an explanation. In desperation and in the grip of the "Green-eyed Monster," he stops at a drug store and buys poison, contemplating suicide. Arriving at his office, he finds a cake sent to his wife by her aunt, in his care; like a flash, a thought of revenge comes into his mind he will poison the cake. Pouring the poison upon it, he sends the cake to his wife at once, thinking she and the brother will eat it.

Receiving the cake, the wife gives the bearer of the cake a note to take back to her husband, telling him of the arrival of her brother. When the husband gets this information he is struck with remorse and hastens home to warn his family not to eat the cake. He arrives with a doctor, too late, they have eaten the cake. The husband is crazed with grief and fear, but the doctor finds that the druggist, probably noticing the husband's agitation, gave him a harmless fluid.

The wife is dumbfounded at her husband's lack of confidence in her. He humbly craves her pardon, but she has decided to leave him. Through the pleadings of their child and love for her, the wife forgives all and a reconciliation is brought about.

THE BEAUTIFUL SNOW.—It is morning, the snow has overspread the ground during the night. "Pop," the principal of these happenings, looks out of the window to behold a sight pleasing to look upon. He is delighted with the aspect and quotes with inspired enthusiasm, "The Beautiful Snow," etc., and aroused with the keen anticipation of its charms, he buoyantly sallies forth.

Taking his first step from the front porch into the "beautiful" he lands on his back at the bottom of the stoop. With his anticipation somewhat disturbed, he picks himself up and continues on his way, only to encounter some boys in a snow fight just in time to receive a volley of the "beautiful" when he least expects it.

Meditatively remarking to himself that "Boys will be boys," our old friend is seen plodding onward unconscious of still greater surprise—"Look out! Here they come!" He is completely upset by some young coasters sliding down hill on their sleds, putting him down for a "turn" that was not expected or announced.

Further in his journeyings, while passing under a window, he is an "easy mark" for a couple of scamps who deluge him with another reminder of the poetic germ. Worse and more of it. Brushing the snow from his clothes, removing it from his collar, chilled and indignant, he escapes into a friendly doorway of a nearby store. While there, he sees some passersby get hit with snowballs and ventures out to tell them that the snowballs are being thrown from above. While they are looking towards the roof, the storekeeper comes out and lets down the awning from which an avalanche of snow completely covers "Pop" and causes him to say some things which would not look well in print.

At home once more, thoroughly disgusted and bewildered, "Pop" vigorously pulls down the shades, shutting out all sight and remembrance of "The Beautiful Snow." He envelops himself in a blanket and throws himself into an easy chair in desperation and despair.

THE HISTORY OF A SARDINE SANDWICH.—A sardine sandwich from start to finish entails a great real more interest than most persons imagine. "Seeing is believing" and it is the purpose of this pictorial history to show just what it means to manufacture one of these delicious little "palate ticklers."

In the northeastern part of Maine is where they catch large numbers of sardines at every haul of the net. After the sardine has been corralled in the weir set in the St. Croix River, which empties into the Atlantic Ocean, the nets are then emptied of their lively little occupants into the fishing boats which spread sail, homeward bound.

Arriving at the docks, they are unloaded into chutes which carry them to the factory, where they are trimmed, cooked, packed, steamed, boxed, or canned, and sealed ready to be shipped to the consumer, who eats them with a relish, which is well attested by the myriads of these little fellows being devoured every year.

PATHE FRERES.

PIERROT.—In their pretty home, Pierrot, his wife and little Pierrot are wondering where their next meal is to come from. The father is a painter by profession, though unsuccessful, and is a musician by choice; he finally takes up his mandolin and goes out to tempt the fates. Beneath the window of a big mansion he plays and sings to amuse the folks within. One of the ladies, delighted by his music, coaxes him to exchange his costume for an embroidered coat and join in the festivities. A young aristocrat, however, is annoyed by this unusual procedure, and challenges him to a duel in which Pierrot is seriously wounded. During his convalescence, Pierrot amuses himself with his mandolin. The familiar tones attract the attention of little Pierrot, who had been searching everywhere, and the child, stealing into the house, guided by the music, throws himself into his father's arms. Pierrot, thereby recalled to his senses, forgets the grandeur surrounding him and donning his old costume, returns to the house he so thoughtlessly forsook.

A HAPPY TURN.—The home of a humble workman. The wife, a pale, delicate-looking woman, is sitting in a chair, and a racking cough is bringing a look of anguish to the face of her devoted husband because he is out of work and the poor girl needs medical attention. Finally, in desperation, he decides to have the doctor, whether or no, and goes out to get one kind-hearted enough to make the visit without pay. The first one he calls on consents to go, and the man, overjoyed at this good fortune, leads him to the poor room where his ailing wife sits. The good doctor diagnoses the case, writes a prescription and is gone. Now another problem confronts the poor fellow—how to get the prescription filled. He goes out to find work, but trying place after place with no result, he wanders off toward the country, and while sitting beside the road is passed by an automobile. He starts up! Why should those people be rich and care free while he is so miserably poor? He follows the car and comes upon it broken down and the occupants are off for a stroll while the chauffeur is repairing the break. Seeing the owners at a little distance, and stealing up behind them, he snatches at the woman's purse and misses it, and is forced to flee. In his flight he drops the prescription, and his pursuers pick it up and surmise the reason for his attempt. They go at once to the office of the doctor whose name is on the prescription, and finding the address of the unfortunate, they seek him out and press into his wife's hands enough money to help them over their present trouble and to last them for some time to come. It is indeed a happy ending for all concerned.

TRAGIC IDYL.—Bathed in brilliant sunshine, the scenes in which the events of this story of love and passion have their beginning and end are a marvel of color, light and shade to which words can hardly do justice. The story is simple, that of plighted love, broken promises, and the madness of a loving father ending in tragedy; but it is the scenery and coloring which will make this film and cause it to be long remembered.

STRENUOUS MASSAGE.—A miserable specimen of humanity finds his joints stiff with rheumatism, and searching out a doctor who gives free consultation, he is advised to resort to a water friction and dry massage. Unfortunately he has no money and, as is well known, the Devil seems to take care of his own and all the elements come to his aid. In a shower of rain he commences. An overflowing water spout provides a fine shower bath, while a bucket of water left outside by the busy housewife comes in well. While handing a few choice remarks to a couple of policemen, he manages to accumulate quite a bit of massage. Seeing a road sweeper, he casts himself in front of it and the obliging drives guides his team over his prostrate form. Our hero arises from his treatment feeling much benefited and goes on his way rejoicing.

A CURE FOR TIMIDITY.—Mr. Henpeck has led the life of the under dog for many a long day. He, who used to be so bright and debonair, is afraid. His wife and mother-in-law have lorded it over him until he dare not call his soul his own. One day, however, while glancing over the paper, he happens to see an advertisement, the wording of which gladdens his poor heart. A wonderful discovery has been made! An instantaneous and positive cure for timidity! Henpeck drops the paper and hurries to interview the advertiser. Finding that the cure consists only in having a little serum injected through the nose, he decides to take it immediately. Wonder of wonders! Hardly has he sniffed up the fluid before he feels like a warrior of old, brave and dauntless! Let his wife or his mother-in-law dare dictate to him now! He'll soon teach them their place. And so it is; he enters his home as he never entered it before, like the master of the place. His wife and mother-in-law stand back in amazement; they can't believe their eyes or their ears as he orders them around. But being subdued by his air of authority and determination they fly at his beck and call, and the last view we get of the poor-spirited, ill-treated husband of the beginning of the story, he is seated at a fine hot meal, although it is not meal time, his two former bosses waiting on him with the greatest solicitude.

TALE OF A TENEMENT.—This is a pretty and sentimental little comedy, played with a fine conception of its possibilities, which lifts it above the usual mediocre level of the generality of sentimental sketches.

Bella, a working girl, hesitates between her two suitors, Maurice and Ralph, both of whom live on the same floor as herself, and watch her comings and goings. Maurice is of a rather quiet and timid nature, whilst Ralph is more debonair, more hail-fellow-well-met.

One day Bella invites the two young men into her room, and Ralph quizzing at the ornaments, remarks how fond she must be of roses, since she has pictures of them and bunches of them in her vases. Bella answeys yes, and laughingly observes that she even wears them on her hat. At the same moment she sees a flower-seller from the window busily selling masses of her favorite flower. The two young men anticipating her desire, rush out to buy some of the roses, and Ralph returns almost immediately with a fine bunch. Maurice has also been hastening back, but at the door of the house he stops abruptly at the sight of a child's coffin standing in the hall, with the stricken father near by. No flower adorns the humble bier, and the young man, moved by compassion, lays the roses on the coffin.

Bella, puzzled by his long absence, has descended the stairs to look for him, and sees the little scene. With a quick movement, she extends her hand to him, and promises to be his wife. The two mount the stairs together and break the news to Ralph, who, although bitterly disappointed in his hopes, is generous-hearted enough to grasp his rival warmly by the hand and offer his congratulations.

SPORTY DAD.—"Unbeknownst to each other," as the charwoman said, Dad and his two sons, Bert and Hal, have been smitten by the charms of the same girl, and make her birthday the excuse for calling upon her, each and separately, with an enormous bunch of pink roses.

Hal is first, and when there is a ring at the door, he is pushed into a stifling cupboard, whilst Kitty makes ready to welcome Bert. Another ring announces the arrival of a third admirer. Dad this time, and Bert goes into the piano. Yet another ring at the door, and Dad has to find refuge under a big chair cover. This time, however, it is only a lady friend, who laughs heartily at her little joke. The two girls play a jolly good rousing duet on the piano, and the sectional view of the inside of the piano with the notes hammering Bert's nose out of shape is unspeakably funny. Dad comes in for a good deal of hustling, whilst Hal wishes he were well out of it—out of the cupboard, that is to say.

The girls tire themselves out at last and then run away and slowly, very slowly, three heads emerge from their hiding places. Mutual recognition and astonishment, and then the jeweled pendant to this glittering golden chain of superlatively funny scenes is the last, in which Dad is seen enjoining the necessity of silence upon his two sons. Gay old dog!

THE ARREST OF THE DUCHESS DE BERRY.—Up to 1780 France had been ruled by kings. The famous Bourbon family had maintained a court of signal magnificence and during the reign of Louis XVI. the extravagances of the court reached such a point that the people, who bore the burden of the expense, revolted. The historic revolution followed. Louis XVI. was arrested with his wife and little son and thrown into a dungeon from which he emerged only to march to the guillotine—a journey on which his devoted wife, Marie Antoinette, soon followed. The little son's history ends with his incarceration, and to this day no one actually knows whether he escaped or died, and the story of the Lost Dauphin has become almost a classic in France. These regicides were followed by a wild, riotous, disordered, farcical government which guillotined everyone who opposed its will. On the scene of this stormy period the shadow of the immortal Napoleon appeared. Genius sat enthroned upon his brow. He brought a semblance of order out of chaos and finally proclaimed himself First Consul of France, exercising almost kingly prerogatives. As the commander of the French Army, to which rank he had risen from that of corporal, he won such distinction and gained such mastery of his men that when he proclaimed himself Emperor, he was able to not only seat himself upon the throne, but to maintain his position and create his brothers Princes. Beyond doubt Napoleon did for France that which almost no other has been able to do for any nation. His conquets were enormous, his army seemed well-nigh invulnerable, but there was a rift in the lute. The constant state of war which Napoleon maintained drained the manhood of France. Nearly every Frenchman was a soldier of the Empire and for every victory won abroad a battle for popularity was lost in the Fatherland in the thousands of humble homes where the footsteps of father, brother, son or sweetheart would never more be heard. Bonapart had many enemies in France and when Wellington conquered and captured the illustrious warrior there was no small part of the nation which welcomed the return of a monarchy. On the abdication of Charles X., Louis Philippe of Orleans, popularly known as the "Citizen King," was coronated. A spirit of unrest was abroad in France, however, and many old royalists and malcontents stirred up constant trouble by endeavoring to enthrone a member of the Bourbon family. It was just such a situation which brought about the dramatic incident pictured in our latest film d'art—"The Arrest of the Duchess de Berry." The episode occurred in 1832. The Duke de Berry, who was the son of Charles X., had been assassinated during the reign of Louis XVIII. and the old royalist party, counting on the fact that the peasantry of La Vendee still retained their adherence to the old reigning house, planned to attempt an insurrection to regain the crown for the son of the Duke de Berry, the Duke of Bordeaux. "Surely," thought they, "if a Bourbon is put forward the peasants of La Vendee will rise as one man."

The Duchess de Berry was not unnaturally chosen to head the insurrection which was to win a throne for her son. However, the uprising was crushed in the very beginning and the Duchess was obliged to flee disguised to Nantes, where she took refuge in the house of her friends, two sisters known as de Guigny.

For five months she remained hidden, but the offer of a large reward by the goverrnment induced one of her party, a man named Deutz, to betray her whereabouts. Nevertheless, when the house of the two sisters was searched, the Duchess was not to be found; she had been hidden away in a secret closet behind the fireplac and no trace of her remained. Deutz, though nonplussedfi stuck to his statement, and stayed behind in the house with some of the soldiers sent to make the arrest. Still puzzled and discountenanced, his mind reverted to the possibility of a hiding place and he commenced to tap the walls. He soon perceived that the one above the fireplace gave forth a hollow sound and immediately gave orders for a fire to be built there. The prisoner behind the wall, forced to cry aloud on account of the ever increasing heat, was discovered, arrested and conveyed to the fortress at Blaye.

Deutz repaired to the government offices in Paris to collect his reward. After counting the notes, the official, rather than touch again the blood-money, picks them up with the fire tongs and with a look of absolute disgust presents them thus at arm's length.

KALEM FILMS

ISSUE OF MARCH 9

Her Soldier Sweetheart

Length 985 Feet

What a great title, and what a great film! We have fairly outdone ourselves in this production. We freely acknowledge it. Here is a headliner which will be talked about as long as the business exists. For dramatic power, intense heart interest, thrilling situations and magnificent photography it stands unsurpassed. We wish we could always turn them out as good.

ISSUE OF MARCH 11

The Robber Baron

Length 970 Feet

This is the first product of our new New York studio, a film entirely different from any you have ever seen run under the KALEM trade-mark. It is a story of the romantic, swash buckling days of Old England, and while most of the situations are intensely dramatic, there is such a strong vien of comedy throughout the story, that a big laugh can be expected in every scene. Don't overlook "THE ROBBER BARON." It is a new and attractive idea.

FOR RELEASE MONDAY, MARCH 7

Marriage in Haste

A fast and furious comedy picture with a novel plot developed into a succession of side-splitting incidents. When the young people elope the girl's father asks the police to arrest them. He pursues them in his motor car and is himself mistaken for the eloper. There is a little girl in the car with him as guide and her tender years move the mob to fury. A rope is around papa's neck when the new son-in-law comes along and saves him. A laugh with every turn of the crank.

APPROXIMATE LENGTH, 825 FEET

FOR RELEASE THURSDAY, MARCH 10

Hearts are Trump

Another stirring story from the Southern division of the Stock Company, an unusually strong plot unraveled amid scenes of tropical luxuriance. Splendid horses and spirited riding form one of the chief attractions of the subject apart from a story which holds the interest in suspense until the last foot of film. APPROXIMATE LENGTH, 900 FEET.

"IMP."

THE DEVOTION OF WOMEN.—Although he has a very pretty wife at home, there is that in the makeup of the adventurer which prompts him to so conduct himself that a little Indian maiden of the Northlands falls in love with him. Of course, he promises her everything—happiness in the future, just as would a swain a-wooing. She, poor, misled little girl, follows the star, as it were, and innocently trusts in him.

But one day he receives a letter from his wife. He must go to her at once; he does not tell the squaw, but prepares to leave. She begs him, entreats, pleads, but he tears himself from her and goes out.

We now see him at home, where he is enjoying the comforts afforded by an indulgent, loving wife. Both are laughing, joking, when there enters an Indian, his Nemesis, from the other settlement, who knows all about the Indian girl, and asks what he proposes to do about her. Hot words follow while the wife looks on and, before she can interfere, there is a flash from a keen blade, and her husband falls. The Indian stalks out.

After making him comfortable, she dashes out in search of aid. She runs a long distance, until she finally collapses from fatigue. The Indian girl whom her husband has deceived finds her here, and while placing her in a wigwam, learns the particulars of the encounter; her first thought is for the wounded deceiver, whom she still loves, and she dashes off to the nearest settlement for a doctor. Finding him, she directs him to the cabin, then going back to the wigwam, begins to drag the weak woman there. They arrive there while the doctor is administering to the wounded man, and announces that he is out of danger. The exhausted wife falls into his arms. The squaw looks about her realizes that there is no further need for her, also that she is a deceived, beguiled, misled little girl; she slowly reaches for a vial, then quickly drinks its contents.

Her sacrifice is complete!

MOTHER LOVE.—A happy young couple are entertaining a houseful of visitors—it is the christening of their first baby. The child falls ill, and the parents become anxious when the heroic measures of the physician show no results. The child sinks, sinks, sinks, until at last, with the couple standing over the little bed, the babe steps softly into the domain of angels, closing its eyes in the slumber that knows no awakening.

The mother is stupefied when the doctor drops his hand significantly, and does not seem to realize her bereavement. Her hands grip the air tensely, spasmodically—her eyes bulge in their sockets—she swoons; and when she is revived the horrible truth is only too evident—her mentality has collapsed. She shrinks in terror from her husband, whom she fails utterly to recognize. He pleads with her, but the mystic forces, shattered, will not respond. He has suddenly become a stranger to her!

She is not a violent maniac; she seems entirely rational only in that she fails to remember that the man who is trying to thrust himself upon her is her husband, and that she resents his advances in disdain; he, heartbroken, realizes that he is wooing his wife a second time as ardently as he did before their marriage. She has entirely forgotten her husband, and shows a decided preference for a mutual friend. But the friend tries in every way, on behalf of the husband, to bring her to a realization; it is useless, for as soon as she sees her husband her manner becomes cold, formal, imperious.

The physician who is attending her happens to have a patient, a pauper woman, who dies leaving a babe that strongly resembles the child whose death wrecked the mother's mind. He brings the husband to the squalid home; he takes the wee survivor in his arms—true, there is a striking resemblance! The physician unfolds a plan.

We next see the home of the couple being decorated exactly as it was when their baby was christened. The other baby is placed in a crib where the bereaved mother sees it and her disordered mentality conforms itself to the deception. She is asked to prepare for the christening and she gaily dresses the child accordingly. Then the ceremony is again enacted, exact in every detail and incident as in the original ceremony.

All watch her intently. The change comes gradually—slowly—steadily—surely. She looks about her—seems dazed—seems to understand—her mind begins to remember; she looks about her, gazes on her sorrowing husband; he holds out his arms and whispers, "My wife!" It is complete. Her mental faculties reorganize themselves—she controls them; her brain clears, and as she falls into her husband's arms, the pseudo christening marks the restoration.

LUX FILMS.

HE KNEW BEST.—The story of borrowed plumes is depicted in this film in a most laughable manner. Captain Slasher is going to pay his respects to a girl he does not want to marry. He suspects that it is going to be a case of his money being the attraction. He therefore arranges that Buttons his valet, shall take his part in the coming interview. Buttons proceeds to make himself agreeable to the lady. With a gentlemanly air he is flourishing his whangee about and displaying his master's suit. At dinner he is most courteous and debonair, but unfortunately his manners are not those of the smart set. This gives the noble but disguised Captain an opportunity of ascertaining whether his suspicions are well founded. Upon discovering that they are he makes loves to a sweet little servant employed at the house of his lady love. During his declarations he and she are discovered. Shortly after master and man return to their home and resume their true roles again. Then comes the little servant who has been dismissed, followed in turn by the family of fortune hunters. They are naturally surprised on perceiving the true state of affairs; and are alarmed when the young and hand some Captain declares his intention of marrying not the mistress, but her servant.

FATHER'S PATRIOTISM.—A number of men are sitting around a table, in the tavern, drinking and talking together, when suddenly a messenger arrives announcing the proclamation of war, and causing great excitement among the guests at the tavern, after which they all run out to enlist in the army at the Town Hall. The various citizens are all sworn in to become protectors of their country.

But in all this crowd there is one who does not want to enlist, but his father is very persistent and forces him, much against the son's will. The son finally decides to please the father, and departs from his mother, who does not want him to go, and who feels very badly at his leaving, but the father tries to comfort her by telling her that his country calls her son to duty.

The son, however, is a coward, and becoming frightened, deserts the army, during a fierce battle, and returns home. The father becomes angry and demands to know why he returned; but when the son tries to explain, the father becomes enraged and calls him a coward and tells him to return to his army. The disappearance of the son is soon discovered by the officers of the army, who make inquiry for his whereabouts at his home. This is too much for the father, but in order to protect his son he denies all knowledge of his desertion and decides to take his son's place, which he bravely does.

During the night, while he is on watch, he dreams of his son leading the army to victory, which shows his vision of a glorious battle, which was won through his son's braveness.

ECLAIR.

TAMING WILD HORSES AT BUENOS AIRES.—Here we have a wonderfully interesting film displaying the equestrian exploits of the gauchos, or cowboys, in the taming of wild beasts in Buenos Aires. Most realistically have we pictured before us the daring feats accomplished by these hardy men of the prairies. This film is really an educational feature, quite apart from the wonderful scenic effect. It affords an accurate appreciation of the cool nerve, calm judgment, and withal the quick and careful motion which it is necessary to bring to play in breaking in the wild and roaming beasts, and carefully and surely molding them into quiet, reliable domestic animals.

THE REVENGE OF DUPONT L'ANGUILLE (From Oscar Metenier's Celebrated Novel).—The young wife of old Dupont, the wrestler, has become estranged from her rhusband. Her affections have been won by the athletic prowess of young Leon le Lyonnais, also wrestler, and friend of Nana's husband. Ultimately, Nana leaves Dupont for Leon, the man she loves. The two lovers lose no opportunity to taunt the old man on his great age and approaching weakness, and his inability to retain the affections of his wife. The old man, insane with rage, vows to have vengeance.

It is the time of the afternoon performance of the wrestlers and acrobats at Bertrand's Circus; the performers enter the ring—old Dupont, burning with personal indignation, challenges the lover of his wife, the brave Leon. Leon shrugs his shoulders and secretly laughs as he thinks how frail will be the enfeebled efforts of the old man, as compared with his own young vigor. The signal is given, and the opponents rush at each other. Dupont wild with passionate anger, takes advantage of the moment—his rage gives him tenfold strength, and he quickly vanquishes the young and daring Leon who leaves the ring followed by the hissing of the wondering public.

Nana watches the proceedingly closely, and in her face are depicted in turn, scorn, surprise, admiration, fear! She cannot but recognize the signal victory her husband has attained—she dare no longer oppose or resist a man such as this—she submissively yields to him and in triumph he bears her home.

THANHOUSER.

THE ACTOR'S CHILDREN.—Eugenie Freeman and Paul Temple join in matrimony and up to the time this picture opens are amply able, by their professional labors, to provide for themselves and the two children who have blessed their union. Then to the breadwinners comes a prolonged lay off and its consequent hardships; how to meet the rent becomes the problem of the hour.

So argues Mrs. O'Brien when Paul confronts her with empty pockets on that momentous occasion "when the rent comes 'round," and even the sight of the Temple children at their innocent play fails to affect the landlady's frame of mind, and a tenant comes along. He is a flashy youth with a "roll," and in the absence of the job-hunting father and mother, Mrs. O'Brien shows him the rooms. He is pleased with them, but wants to know what to do with the children—he certainly doesn't want to be afflicted with them. Mrs. O'Brien tells him not to worry about the tots and casts them out of the house.

Alone and friendless in the streets of a great city it is little wonder that the children fall captive to the wiles of an Italian organ grinder, who takes them to his hovel and instructs them in the art of dancing to a hurdygurdy much as a dog trainer teaches a mongrel stage tricks—with an oath and a whipping. Luckily, the children are rescued from the foreigner by a kindly theater manager, who recognizes dancing ability in the youngsters and finds a place for them on his program.

The parents have meanwhile searched long and fruitlessly for the children. To add to their grief is the fact that they have fallen heir to a relative's fortune. In hope of finding the little ones, the parents attend all large gatherings and make the rounds of all the places of amusement. So when they enter the theater where the children do their dancing act it is as pretty a picture as "child actors" ever helped create.

THE INDIAN AND THE COWGIRL (Bison).—While on a peaceful hunting trip, Red Cloud, an Indian, is held up and an attempt to rob him is made by a band of cattle rustlers. Just at this moment a cowgirl comes riding upon the scene. Pulling her gun she demands of the rustlers to set the Indian free. Upon their doing so Red Cloud mounts his horse and rides away, vowing that some day he will repay the cowgirl for her brave act. The cattle rustlers, angry at being frustrated in their attempt to rob Red Cloud, swear to get revenge upon the cowgirl. Stealing her little daughter, they tie the child on the back of a horse and drive it at breakneck speed across the plains. One of the rustlers writes a note, tacking it to the side of the house: "Miss Smarty, get your Indian friend to hunt for your brat, you will find her tied to the back of one of your broncbos, God knows where next time mind your own business." Upon finding the note the cowgirl gives the alarm and one of the first to respond to her call for help is Red Cloud, who by the wonderful scent of the Indian, soon picks up the trail of the horses and tells the cowboys who have gathered in what direction the rustlers have gone. Red Cloud and the cowgirl, who follow the horse and child, have an exciting and thrilling chase, finally coming upon them, and by clever manipulating of her lariat, the cowgirl lassoes the horse, rescuing her child unharmed, and Red Cloud's reward is paid.

THE ROSE OF THE RANCH (Bison).—Le Anita, the beautiful daughter of Don Giovannio, receives a note from the man she loves, Jose A'Comelesta, requesting her to meet him at twilight in the "Garden of Roses." While Le Anita and Jose are strolling through the garden, Pedro Venneto, who holds a mortgage on Giovannio's home, comes to ask him for the hand of his daughter. Giovannio, indignant, orders him to depart, Venneto answering, "Ah, my kind sir, you forget I hold a mortgage on your home; my request must be fulfilled or I will foreclose the mortgage." Giovannio, realizing that he will be ruined, reluctantly consents to Venneto's villainous proposition. Upon the return of Le Anita, Giovannio tells her that she is to marry Venneto. Le Anita tells her father that she loves Jose and will not marry any other man. Venneto, growing anxious to marry Le Anita, sends for the Padre to come and perform the ceremony at once. Le Anita sends a note to Jose telling him to come as she is in trouble. Jose reaches the house just before the Padre does and flees with Le Anita, pursued by Giovannio and Venneto, who, upon overtaking them, attack Jose, leaving him lying senseless on the ground, taking Le Anita back to the house, where the ceremony is just about to be performed, when Jose, who has revived, rushes in and attacks Venneto, killing him. Giovannio, begging forgiveness, consents to the marriage of Le Anita and Jose.

FATAL IMPRUDENCE (Ambrosio).—Jacques Courtier is just starting out on a hunting trip when his little son begs to go with him. While wandering through the woods they come to a brook. Jacques nimbly jumps it, but his little son is not able to do so. While using his rifle to guide the little fellow across on some rocks, it is accidently discharged, killing Jacques. The little son is frightened and runs away, leaving his father lying dead on the ground. A tramp, wandering in the woods, finds Jacques and tries to help him, not knowing that he is dead. The police appear just at this moment and arrest the tramp as the murderer of Jacques. When taken before the court the tramp swears that he is innocent but the police do not believe him and are just about to sentence him to a long term in prison when the little son of Jacques rushes into the court room and tells how his father died.

FOUR "Imps" on these TWO reels

Always tickled to death to do as the exhibitors and exchanges ask us, we have rigged up a rattling good bunch of short and medium length stories for the week beginning Monday, March 21st. Instead of standing on our dignity and ignoring the requests that pour in on us, we take the attitude that the best way to gain popularity is to go after it tooth and nail, hide and horns. That's one of the reasons why the success of "IMP" films is the wonder of the world. Only four months in business, and selling twice as many films as our friends, the enemy, predicted we would—that's our record, and it's no wonder we're proud of it!

Injunctions and the Enjoined.

It will be foolish for anybody on the independent side of the moving picture industry to ignore the meaning and the importance of the injunctions granted by Justice Noyes this week in the suits brought by the Motion Picture Patents Company against two independent film manufacturers. For the first time in the history of the Patents Company we have their case from a legal aspect clearly stated by a Supreme Court Judge. This Judge practically upholds the attitude which the Patents Company has maintained since its establishment over fifteen months ago and in the face of the issuance of the injunctions asked for we repeat that it would be foolish for any independent manufacturer to continue infringing the Motion Picture Patents Company's rights.

Irrespective of the legal side of this case there is one aspect of the matter which we think should receive manufacturers, either individually or collectively, any primary attention in this article. It is this: that the insincere, misleading, one might say the dishonest agitator receives his quietus by the decision of Justice Noyes. This individual has all along done his best to obscure the issue by introducing all sorts of extraneous matter into it, which was, and is, whether certain independent manufacturers have or have not infringed certain patent rights owned by the Motion Picture Patents Company. The name of Mr. Friese Greene, an English inventor, has been dragged into the matter. Mr. Friese Greene's patent rights in this country and in every other country are very shadowy indeed. They do not affect the present issue at all. Then there is mentioned the name of a Mr. Levison as having done something some time ago. We also have the names of other inventors, real or imaginary, given as having done something depriving Mr. Edison of his patent rights. All these people have nothing to do with the case. The evidence, to quote Justice Noyes, is "insufficient to convince him that had it been introduced into former cases a different conclusion would probably have been reached." We hope, therefore, that the independents will no longer be deceived by the fatuity and the futility of the red herring in the shape of pseudo inventions or alleged inventions which weaken the Patents Company's case.

Then there is the anti-Sherman law bogey. Ever since the Patents Company started, this bogey has been brandished by the dishonest agitator and the parrot cry has been repeated by his followers amongst the independents. Justice Noyes gives this agitating charlatan his quietus. Says he with cold, clear matter-of-factness: "Violation of the Federal anti-trust statute is not a defense in an action for the infringement of a patent and fails to show a defect in the complainant's title." Remorseless, but common sense.

So the injunctions will stand unless defendants would like to appeal, which they have signified their intention of doing.

On the other hand, we think that they and their fellow-manufacturers will take good care not to infringe, in future, patent rights which have been validated, one might say, over and over again. There is another aspect of this matter which we present to the reader on broad public grounds. Let it be clearly understood that we hold no brief for the Patents Company or indeed for anybody else in this matter; they have certain rights and apparently are upholding them. These right, however, neither give the Patents Company as such, nor the associated monopoly in the making of moving pictures. There are more ways of making moving pictures than one; that is to say, there is more than one way of controlling the movements of a flexible film behind the taking lens. In other words, the would-be maker of moving pictures for commercial purposes is not limited in the particular kind of camera he can use in making those pictures. That is why we think the independent manufacturers have shown such a singular lack of resource. They seemed to have allowed themselves to be goaded into infringing clear patent rights instead of, as we should have thought they would have done like men of brains and intelligence, casting about for other forms of cameras which are certainly available. But now they have learned a lesson, at some expense and trouble, and it is to be hoped it will not be lost upon them.

There is an old proverb which says that there is no use kicking against the pricks. The "pricks" in this case were certain clearly defined patent rights, the validity of which has been sustained. There can only be one result of any infringement of those rights. We hope the independent manufacturers will recognize the logic of events; leave established rights alone; use their own cameras, or their own special way of making moving pictures; shut their ears to the advice of the misleading and dishonest agitator who fattens upon their ignorance, and go and make good pictures and sell them. For, as is said in our hearing over and over again, the independent side is weak in respect of many things, but chiefly in respect of the poor quality of the pictures they are making.

What of the Future?

The duplication, overlapping and lack of originality in some modern moving picture plays leads us to ask the question, "Where are all the plots for moving picture plays to come from in the future?" At the present rate of consumption it would seem that it will soon be extremely difficult to produce anything that does not closely resemble something that has been done before. Film subjects are being produced at the rate of thirty or more a week in this country alone, or something like 1,500 a year. To keep this up and at the same time preserve originality seems wellnigh impossible. A play will run for weeks, months or years, yet theater managers are ever up against the proposition of obtaining material sufficiently original and attractive to be accepted by the public. A film plot is practically dead in three months, and where one new play is introduced to the living stage, scores, yes, hundreds of film plots are placed on the market. Already the leading film manufacturers are engaging the services of the best literary talent available, and this is the logical resource of those who would keep the quality of their productions in the lead. Even then it seems that the changes have been rung ad nauseum on every dramatic theme—love, jealousy, heroism, cowardice, infidelity, mistaken identity, violence, vice and virtue, and the brains of the world has been ransacked for comedy situations.

How long will the manufacturers be able to hold the public interest, which cannot be done with duplication? It seems to us that the only avenue of escape is that which has already been taken by a few leading producers, and that is to select a single dramatic moment and lead up to it and enrich it with a fineness of detail, a searching character analysis and touches of real life. This requires a creative talent, a superior intelligence which is wofully lacking in the producing field. But it can be found, and our answer to the question, "What of the future?" is that given by a great painter when an amateur asked what he mixed his colors with—BRAINS.

The Picture On Its Defense.

History repeats itself. This is an observation that we have made before, but necessity calls for its repetition. Seventy years ago when the daguerreotype was introduced, painters were up in arms—by painters we mean portrait and landscape artists in colors. These people feared that the new process of making portraits on silvered copper would interfere with their work. Any student of literature of the period will bear us out that the opposition to the daguerreotype was a virulent one. In later times when photographs on paper became prevalent something of the same sort of abjection to them existed. Even at the present time there are many painters and illustrators who view photography with disfavor, because they think that it interferes with their work. The consequence is that there still exists antipathy to the recognition of photography as one of the graphic arts.

The moving picture has apparently to encounter the same kind of jealous opposition. Theatrical men do not like it because it is said to interfere with the theatrical business. To the credit of their intelligence, however, many theatrical men are adopting the picture for the purpose of preventing their houses from going dark. Indeed, the signs are clear to us that in the more intelligent amongst the theatrical managers of the country, the moving picture will ultimately find its best friends.

Within the last year or so, however, possibly the most insidious opposition which the picture has had has arisen in the vaudeville ranks. From time to time we thought we discerned in the variety press an attitude towards the picture which could hardly be regarded as favorable. But now we have no longer any doubt on the point. The press organs of the variety business at the present time seem to exert all their ingenuity in attacking the picture from all sides. They have apparently joined forces with the clerical opponents of the picture and those types of mind which can see no good in a photograph made in a moving picture camera. Only a few months ago we were consulted by one of the leading film manufacturers in the United States as to the irrational and antagonistic attitude which some of these people were taking up towards pictures which were earning nothing but judicious commendation from lovers of the moving picure as a healthy form of entertainment. We were at a loss to account for this attitude, but now, after a careful study of the situation the whole plot is apparent. It is nothing more nor less than an organized, one might say subsidized, attempt on the part of vaudeville and variety interests to discredit the moving picture at all costs, to drive it from the vaudeville houses and to render its further existence in the ordinary picture theater an impossibility.

It is tolerably clear to us that there is a new press and pulpit campaign in operation. The authorities of the various cities are being prejudiced against the picture. They are persuaded to see evil in pictures where non exists; vaudville is being thrust before the public to the exclusion of the picture. In short at this moment there is an open war between vaudeville interests and the picture interests.

It is unfortunate that the film manufacturers, renters and others interested in the business in this country do not seem to realize the gravity of the situation. It is time, we think, that their attention was directed to the matter. Either the Motion Picture Patents Company or the manufacturers in the Association, the Film Service Association, the Alliance and all those having the progress of the moving picture at heart should, we think, get together and take steps to neutralize this vicious opposition. It seems only yesterday that the picture was fighting for its life in almost every center in the United States and now, just as we are congratulating ourselves that its future seemed assured, civic, religious, philanthropic and press opposition is breaking out more energetically than ever. It is true that the papers in which this opposition is manifesting itself are not of the highest class, but it would be idle to ignore the fact that they are not wholly without influence in their own particular field. They have all the capacity for poisoning the public mind against the picture. More the pity. We shall consider it our duty week by week to neutralize this venomous and vicious attack on the picture by nailing down the truth of matters as far as lies in our power.

We call upon all our readers to sit upon and squelch the numerous ignorant blatherskites who blame the moving picture for every young criminal or victim of sensuality. Our readers should also write to or call upon the editors of their local papers and point out the absurdity and injustice of printing baseless innuendos. Our Buffalo correspondent sends us a clipping from the "Courier" of that city, recounting the experience of several young girls in a Chinese laundry, and ends by quoting the probation ofncer as blaming moving picture shows and penny arcades as the cause of the downfall of these girls! Could anything be more absurd or farther from the truth? One would be led to believe, from the arguments of these pettifoggers, that virtue reigned supreme in the world until a few years ago when the picture shows came into vogue! If so, the credit of this invention would belong to the devil, and eminent men would not be so earnest in establishing their rights to that honor.

Objectionable Vaudeville.

On another page we reprint an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor, Boston, Mass., which reflects the sentiments of all who are deeply interested in the regulation and permanence of the poor man's theater. The article also corroborates the repeated contention of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD that vaudeville is superfluous and entirely out of place in the five and ten-cent show house of limited seating capacity. As the Monitor puts it, "The acts are usually objectionable, also of poor quality, owing to the small remuneration. They are either old performers (whose talents are not up to the requirements of the larger houses) or else they are wholly untrained beginners of small talent who are thus entering the amusement world."

It is very obvious that the small store show cannot afford to pay what a good act is worth and the fact that they have padded their programs with atrocities in the name of vaudeville is the chief reason why they are rapidly being superseded by larger theaters who can stand the expense. It is not that a successful business cannot be done without the aid of vaudeville, as we can point to hundreds of managers who do a thriving business with just the pictures and songs.

We also desire to point out the injustice of placing upon the exhibitor the blame of "showing any pictures depicting criminality and violence,"—at least while the present system of film distribution prevails. He has to take what his exchange sends him and the exchange, in turn, is equally at the mercy of the manufacturer. If the exhibitor had the privilege of selecting his program he would indeed be subject to censure if he did not cater to the tastes of his patrons and show only those films which would be most popular in his community. It is a known fact that their inability to select their film program, or to obtain service that did not clash with their nearest competitors, has driven many exhibitors to add vaudeville to the program, who would not otherwise have done so. This and also the overcrowding of theaters, for which, of course, the exhibitors are alone responsible.

Now, while we claim that the rightly conducted picture show is sufficient attraction in itself, and we deprecate its being used as a filler or chaser to vaudeville, it is equally fair to the vaudeville interests that vaudeville quality be maintained when both are used in conjunction. In this city, during the past week, we visited a theater that for some time ran pictures exclusively, but now features vaudeville. One item on the program was the film, "Ouchard, the Merchant," which has been the subject of much adverse criticism, but it was a Sunday school sermon in comparison to a vaudeville act on the same program. The act, the name of which we charitably withhold, besides being rawly presented, contained suggestive allusions and compromising situations such as no film maker would think of recording.

So the point raised by the Monitor that the "low grade variety act is one objection to picture shows" is very well taken and in view of the present activity of the (pious?) crusader it is something on which the theater manager ought to act immediately. The remedy is obvious. The organized attack on the moving picture by publications that represent the vaudeville interests may be consistent with their policy, but the strictures they bring to bear are inconsistent to a degree that renders them harmless, if, indeed, they are noticed by anyone Wonder what our readers would think if we were to fill our pages with a list of vaudeville acts and stage dramas and plays that have been or ought to be censored?

Essanay Enterprise Once More.

It is pleasant to turn from the vitiated rubbish about the moving picture which is at present appearing in certain variety and other publications to some of the references to the subject in our trade contemporaries For example: we have been very much interested to read a helpful appreciation of the advertising value of the moving picture which is printed in a recent number of Printer's Ink. We reproduce that article in another part of this week's WORLD as showing what an outside commentator thinks of the moving picture as a business bringer.

Of special interest to us is a reference to the enterprise of the Essanay Company in devoting a branch of their business to the production of industrial pictures. The company has found by this, of course, that they have an almost illimitable field to work in. Time after time it has been suggested to us by those interested in the moving picture that its industrial possibilities were great—in other words, that it would pay one or two large firms specially to devote themselves to the making of moving pictures for advertising purposes. Moreover we are frequently asked here in New York City for the address of a firm who would send out an operator for the purpose of taking moving pictures for industrial purposes. It is to the credit of the Essanay Company, and is one more evidence of their enterprise, that they are taking up this kind of business. And from what we see of the possibilities it would pay them, we think, to open up a New York office especially for this department.

The industrial possibilities of the moving picture have never yet been fully exploited on the one hand or availed of on the other. Some of the great railroad concerns in this country advertise their roads in foreign lands by means of the moving picture. Similarly the Canadian government advertise their sparsely populated country in Great Britain by means of especially made moving pictures. Here and there, too, a steamship company tries something of the kind. Of course these subjects are of a spectacular nature and, aside from their advertising mission, really interest the general public. What we want to see, and what clearly the Essanay Company are prepared to do, are the minor industries illustrated by means of the moving picture camera so that greater public knowledge of the world's work should diffuse itself. For example, amongst our cuttings we have one referring to the recent production of a film in St. Louis illustrating boot and shoe manufacture. This is one of the many obvious applications of the moving picture camera.

Of course, in many respects the licensed manufacturers are catering to a love of technical knowledge on the part of the public by occasionally releasing an industrial subject. This fact should not pass without acknowledgement in this article, the object of which is to show that the moving picture is of vast commercial and industrial importance to the community, particularly at this time when so much vicious nonsense is being printed about its demoralizing tendencies.

HERBERT MILES—A PICTURE PIONEER.

In a business which is hardly more than a decade old it seems somewhat premature to talk of pioneers. Somewhat too soon, in fact, to begin to descant upon the beginning of things with which one is associated. Reminiscences are the privileges of age, and age, of course, makes the pioneers. The man who was there first and who has lived long enough to outdistance his competitors or contemporaries. Such a man was D. O. Mills, who died the other day. He was the last of the men of 1849, —those who made California famous, at the time of the gold rush.

Now it will be many a long day before Herbert Miles is old or even middle aged, and yet, for all that he is a pioneer in the moving picture field. And we want him to enjoy the glory and distinction of being a pioneer in his young manhood. Wending our way the other day to the Miles Building, on Sixth avenue, we were just in time to see the black cloud of operators which gathered there at 11 o'clock every day for the purpose of exchanging their films. We were just in time to see this black cloud dispersing. Such a gathering gives one a view of an interesting phase of the film business as it is at present conducted, namely the work of replacing one day's films by those of the morrow, which is done by the operators.

And here, incidentally, we must say that the crowd of men whom we saw in the great Sixth avenue exchange hardly fell within Mr. Hoffman's description of the operator, which we printed the other week. They were just a decent, orderly, hard working crowd of men. That's all.

The more often we probe the past history of those interested in the moving picture field to-day, the more often do we discover that between them and ourselves who write this there is a bond of sympathy. The author of this article graduted from, or rather translated himself from, the stationary photographic field into the moving picture field. So it seems with many of the others—manufacturers, renters and exhibitors. It looks as if a few years ago there was a common feeling that stationary photography no longer offered inducements of interest and money making schemes to the adventurous and so great numbers of people deserted it for the moving picture end of things. This is a matter of fact.

Herbert Miles, like ourselves, was interested in the stationary photographic end of matters before the glamor of the moving picture photograph attracted him. We started our little talk looking over a great number of Cuban photographs done in the year 1897, for which he and his late brother were responsible. Then came the incident of his first entrance into the moving picture field, namely the production of some Alaskan moving pictures and their public exhibition some twelve years ago. Then, later on, came the opening of the first especially adapted moving picture theater in New York City. Then were various enterprises in the moving picture theater line, both here and in the West, as far off in the Northwest as Seattle. Then commenced the first shipment by the Miles' to Scafe, of Lynn, Mass., thus forging the first link of the business chain that has stretched out ever since to the present time.

This would be about twelve years ago, which practically fixed the foundation of the rental business of the United States, if not the world, by the Miles'. So here we have Herbert Miles in three pioneer capacities—as an early one to use the moving picture camera for exhibition purposes, as in his Alaskan exploits, as an early man at the exhibiting game and one of the earliest, if not the earliest, in the renting business. Rather a striking pioneer record for the alert, youthful looking secretary of the Film Service Association, and certainly a very varied and crowded career to look back on.

As a pioneer in the business, of course, Miles Brothers reaped their reward. Like other businesses, recent changes have not been without effect upon them. The renter to-day in fact is confronted by the necessity of having to work on a smaller margin of profit that he was a few years ago. Of course the business is greater and there are more renters. But the exhibitor is wise to his opportunities and so he forces prices down. Mr. Miles, like others, would like to see the business so constituted that the exchanges could work to a uniform schedule. Whether that state of things will eventuate, however, looks doubtful at present.

We naturally touched upon the Film Service Association, its history and present standing. Mr. Miles emphasizes its purely social character, although, like ourselves, he looks back to the recent convention at the Imperial Hotel, New York City, as having produced some good progressive work. The meeting at Detroit, in July, promises to be a great success.

The moving picture industry, young as it is, of course has its pioneers, as we have already pointed out, who, like the industry, are mostly young. They are so near to the beginning of things that their recollections are likely to be fresh, whereas in the case of age distance somewhat hallows old associations. Time softens outlines, and so one gets a more or less impressionistic effect of what happened in the beginning of things. You get nothing of this kind from Herbert Miles. It is all clear-cut, concise, matter of fact—something like himself. The figures of the business done by Miles Brothers as renters made our teeth water. No! We shall not print them; lest we excite cupidity and covetousness. Miles Brothers is a big business exchange with a hard working staff, as all the world can see for itself when it goes there.

Miles's nearly boxed the compass of the moving picture field by becoming film manufacturers. But it was not to be. "There is a divinity that does shape our ends, rough hew them how we will." Perhaps it is well they did not become manufacturers, otherwise we should not have this interesting yarn with Mr. Miles—a yarn, by the way, which comprehended the state of the moving picture business across the Atlantic three years ago. It looks to us as if Mr. Miles were born to be the secretary of the Film Service Association. Secretaries are born, not made. In our time we have had to call on many of the class and watch them at their work. It does not matter whom you have as president or what sort of committee you have, it is the secretary that makes or mars the association for which he works. We threw out the suggestion to Mr. Miles that the Film Service Association and what we have seen of it has the capacity of becoming the most important organization in the moving picture field, and we discussed the possibilities of the outlook without, however, coming to any definite conclusion on the point.

After all, the F. S. A. is but a young body and time is needful to solidify it and make it vitally effective in the scheme of things. We rather think we detected a rebellious gleam in Mr. Miles' eye when we hinted at the possibilities before the F. S. A. All secretaries are the same—they are apt to protest against any addition to their work. For, however much you thank a secretary, it is never adequate to what he does. He is a long suffering man. As to Mr. Miles' outlook, if we can interpret it for him, it is that of cheerful confidence in the future of the business. You have only to look at the activity that goes on in the great Sixth avenue exchange to realize that though present conditions may not be all that one could desire, yet the exchanges are an essential factor in the business, especially those which handle the business in a prompt, businesslike and efficient manner. Every now and again we hear talk about the suppression or abolition of the exchanges. But this, so far as we can judge, is out of the question. They may be diminished in number, but they will always remain as a cardinal factor. We emphasized this point in these pages some months ago, but were contradicted by a brother scribe whom more experience and observation have probably taught the error of his ways.

One of the crucial questions at present before the exchange is that of the handling of pictures on non-inflammable film. We gathered that perfect satisfaction on this point does not yet exist either with the manufacturers, the exchanges or the exhibitors. The perfected product does not yet seem to be in general use, but still there are signs that all-round satisfaction will soon be reached.

In our long talk with Mr. Miles there were many other little points touched upon on which we were glad to have our memory refreshed, and above all things to obtain many valuable historical notes. Some of these we shall touch upon in future articles. Meanwhile, we would like to say this in all sincerity, that we were glad to meet a man of the type of Herbert Miles in a commanding position in the industry. That is to say, without undue adulation, a man of experience, resource, enterprise, intelligence and with such comparative youth on his side which surely entitles him to look forward to a long and prosperous career in the film renting business.

UNIFORMED ATTENDANTS.

We all respect the uniform because it is a mark of authority and order, whether the wearer be a policeman, soldier, sailor, clergyman or the like. We all need keeping in order, we all respect order, therefore we like order—or those of us who have properly regulated minds.

Order, it is said, is heaven's first law. We are glad to see that the moving picture theaters throughout the country are recognizing the importance of order in the scheme of things. In recognizing the value of order they are taking the very proper and very obvious step of placing their attendants in uniform. This they are doing as good business men for the best of all possible reasons, that is, because it pays. It pays because the public at large, as we have pointed out, recognize the value of order as symbolized by the uniform. When we ourselves go to a moving picture show we are always glad to recognize the presence or the imminence of the man in uniform because we know that if we approach him we shall get the necessary information with regard to seating and other things. We know that if we want direction to any particular point he is the man to go to. More than that, the presence of a uniformed attendant at a moving picture house, whether outside or inside, symbolizes order, in that the public at large recognizes that he is the representative of the proprietor of the house and is there to keep order.

Above all things we like to see uniformed attendants outside of the house as well as in the inside. They add to the dignity of the business, they impress the public, they attract the public. If the uniforms are in good taste they attract the eye and probably lead many people to patronize the moving picture theater who would otherwise not do so. As a last word on this subject, we are glad to see the growth of uniformed attendants at moving picture theaters because it evinces a desire on the part of moving picture exhibitors to respect the public by insisting that their ushers and attendants shall be in the fit and proper external state to greet and receive the public. This being so, we think the public will respond to this wise movement on the part of moving picture exhibitors.

In the pages of the Moving picture World, both this and last week, were many advertisements of firms who make a specialty of preparing uniforms for attendants at these theaters, and we strongly urge our exhibiting readers who have not so far placed their attendants in uniforms to get in touch with these advertisers whom we have specially invited to advertise their specialties in the pages of The Moving Picture World. We hope in the immediate future never to visit a moving picture theater unless the attendants are properly and neatly uniformed. For that way success in attracting the public unquestionably lies.

The Optics of the Moving Picture.

CHAPTER I.—INTRODUCTORY.

"Let there be light." This, if we may quote therefrom, is a sentence that occurs in the first chapter of Genesis. Light, therefore, is essential to life. If there were no light, why then we should not be dictating this article If there were no light, no moving picture would be taken and certainly no moving picture would ever be shown The optics of the moving picture, then, simply means the relationship of light to the taking and the production of the picture. What we want to do then in this series of short articles, is to have a little elementary talk on the nature of light and how it is to be controlled in the proper exhibition of the picture. We do not wish to deal with the actual making of the negative. That is a manufacturer's matter; we want to treat of light from the point of view of the operator who has to show the picture We want the operator to know something of the nature of light, generally, and to understand more clearly the lenticular agency that has to be employed for utilizing his light in projecting his picture on the screen. And by lenticular agency we mean, in simple phraseology, the lenses: the condensers and the objective.

First of all as to the nature of light. Let it be clearly understood that between sunlight, gaslight, lamplight or electric light there is a number of points of resemblance which outnumber the points of difference. In fact it may be roughly said that all light, no matter how it is produced, has pretty well much the same origin, that of incandescence.

To take the case of the light on which we are looking this minute, namely the sunlight, we shall get roughly as good an idea of what light is as if we studied the electric arc, incandescent electricity, acetylene, illuminating gas or any other illuminant. Situated roughly 90,000,000 of miles from the earth, the sun may be looked upon as a vast mass of heat or incandescence which coming from that great distance looks to the human eye a comparatively small ball or point of light. It sends out in all directions, lines of pencils of brightness which we call light rays. These are variously called radiations, light waves or sensations. They strike on the eye and produce the effect of sight just as sound waves or sensations strike on the ear or aural nerves and produce the effect of sound. For our present purpose it will be useful to regard light simply as a liquid perfectly within our own control. We can admit it to our houses in greater or lesser degree by increasing or diminishing the number of windows. If we want to concentrate light rays and bring them to a very sharp point on the hand or the coat sleeve we can do so by what is commonly called a burning-glass. In other words, a double convex lens. Then we might bring the rays or pencils of light so close together in a bundle, as it were, which would so compress them that the pressure of these compressed light waves on the coat would burn it or would pain our hand. This would show what power a little optical instrument like a burning-glass or double convex lens gives over the rays of the sun. It brings those scattered rays to the sharpest of sharp points. Similarly if underneath that burning-glass we should hold a glass of an opposite character, that is double concave or hollow on each side, we would throw the light outwards. It would cease to be a point, the rays would scatter and there would be no burning of our coat or hand.

This, then, should show the operator that all light is easily controlled. Pursuing the analogy of a liquid, we can imagine light to be water coming out of a narrow tube, falling upon a perforated metal surface, scattering instead of cohering, then being got into another tube and then being condensed or restricted in volume. To enter deeply into the nature and property of light would be foreign to our present purpose, which is, as we have said, by a series of simple similes, to instill into the minds of those who have not had an education in physics that after all for the purpose of moving picture projection the essential facts about light which it is necessary for the operator to thoroughly understand are few. These essential facts are that light is a very controllable phenomenon comparable in some respects, as we have said, to liquid such as water. You can condense, increase or diminish it at will. And the agencies by which these changes are effected are very simple, indeed.

What we desire, then, in this introductory chapter to emphasize is that all light, no matter how it is produced, is of a common nature and has the properties of adaptability to almost all requirements of illumination, especially in projecting pictures on the screen.

MOTION PICTURE PATENTS COMPANY VS. INDEPENDENT MOVING PICTURES COMPANY AND PANTOGRAPH CORPORATION.

The following opinion was handed down, on March 8, by Judge Noyes, of the Supreme Court. Shorn of its legal phraseology, the learned judge's opinion is that the injunction should be granted, but he would not take the responsibility of so ordering until the case had been finally argued before the Circuit Court of Appeals, which, in a previous case, had sustained the validity of the patents controlled by the complainants. Assuming the appeal, he advised that counsel come together and agree upon the amount of bond to be deposited by each litigant to protect the respective interests.

The text of Judge Noyes' opinion follows:

The validity of the patent in suit has been adjudicated by the Circuit Court of Appeals for this circuit (151 Fed. 767) and infringement on the part of the defendant corporations is conceded, consequently a preliminary injunction should issue, unless this court is convinced

First: Of the probability that had the evidence of new disclosures and uses been brought before the Circuit Court of Appeals its conclusion would have been different; or,

Second, That the complainant is without title to the patent.

The evidence concerning the Levison disclosure and the Greene patent, or invention, is however insufficient to convince me that had it been introduced in the former case a different conclusion would probably have been reached. I am also of the opinion that the charge, if established, that the complainant is, itself, or is a member of a combination in violation of the Federal anti-trust statute is not a defense available in an action for the infringement of a patent and fails to show a defect in the complainant's title.

An injunction against the corporation defendants may, therefore, issue.

The proof of personal infringement by the defendant Laemmle is, however, deemed insufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction against him, and it is denied; but this action is without prejudice to the right of the complainants to renew its application in case future acts of personal infringement are disclosed.

This case seems to be fully presented upon affidavits and it is assumed that the defendants will desire to appeal from this order of the court, which, in view of its previous decision, can best pass upon the matter. Such appeal being privileged a speedy hearing can be obtained. I am inclined to suspend the issuance of an injunction until after a determination of the appeal, provided,

First: The appeal is brought on for a hearing at the May session of the Circuit Court of Appeals; and,

Second, That the corporation defendants furnish an adequate bond to pay damages and account for profits during the pendency of the appeal if it is unsuccessful. If the issuance of the injunction is not suspended pending the appeal a bond by the complainants to answer all damages occasioned by the issuance of the injunction would seem proper. Counsel may present memoranda and affidavits upon these suggestions and the amount of bond necessary for the protection of the respective interests.

One of the interesting tid-bits of comment in the moving picture field the past week was the partial transformation of a Chinese theater in New York City into a moving picture house and the accomplishment of this by one who is not only not a Chinese, but is a star in the White Way string of theaters. This particular person is Raymond Hitchcock, and he has made a hit of it. He does not personally conduct the place, but is its promoter and backer. It is said that Hitchcock has a peculiar hankering for anything in the Chinese line. It is a hobby with him. He heard the Chinese theater on Doyers street had remained closed for several months and decided to invest some of his spare funds in it. It was the last place any investor would hit upon for the picture business and for this reason Hitchcock is given credit for rare foresight and keen business tact that few of his friends thought he possessed. The program at the place the past week, its first, consisted of moving pictures, song and dance act and a Chinese opera rendered by a troupe of Chinese people in their native tongue. Business has been good and promises to continue so. The patrons are almost wholly Chinese. Sightseers help to swell the audiences and, as the admission price is fifteen cents, their patronage is worthy of attention by the management. William Cavanaugh is the manager. All the others on the payroll, with the exception of the operator of the picture machine, are Chinese, which include the ticket seller, ticket taker, scene shifters and the orchestra. The pictures are supplied by the American Vitagraph Company. The Chinese call it "Vlitaglaph."

Well, the first round of the fight between the Motion Picture Patents Company on the one side and the Laemmle and Pantograph Companies on the other has been fought and the Patents Company get the decision, as will be seen by the report of the cases appearing in another column of this paper. The Independents scored but one point, the court refused to grant an injunction against Carl Laemmle personally, but this advantage is tempered to an extent by the deciding Judge declaring that the injunction is denied with the proviso that the Patents Company may ask for an injunction against Laemmle personally at any time it can show personal infringement of the patents. The case was heard in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, the decision being given by Judge Noyes. Before the case was heard and while the decision was awaited the Independent companies seemed to pin a great deal of faith on the defense they made to the effect that the Patents Company had no standing in court becuse it was illegal in itself, inasmuch as it is a combination in violation of the ant-trust laws. Judge Noyes dismissed this contention with an opinion that, even if true, it did not constitute a defense in an action for infringement of a patent, nor did it show a defect in the title claimed to the patents by the Patents Company.

Another interesting view taken of the cases by Judge Noyes is that referring to the Levison and Greene inventions, both of which have been very much relied upon by the companies interested in opposing the claims of the Patents Company. The defendant companies, in the case just decided, presented papers to show that in 1888, before Edison made his invention, Wallace G. Levison, of Brooklyn, invented and built a motion picture camera in which pictures were taken on separate dry plates, which were carried on a wheel and exposed intermittently; and that in the same year he made known in a lecture in Brooklyn a film camera much like the camera now in use. It was also argued before the court that William Friese-Greene, of England, invented in that country a motion picture camera long before Edison built his first film camera, and before Edison built that camera he got the idea from Greene. The attorneys for the defendants strongly contended that had these matters been presented to and considered by the court that rendered the decision upon which the Patents Company relies, the decision would have been different. Judge Noyes decided against the defendants on this point, saying there was not sufficient evidence to convince him that had these matters been introduced in the former case there would have been a different decision.

The month of May will be an important one to the film manufacturers on both sides of the fence. It will be the sequel, and an important one, to the decision just rendered by Judge Noyes, who has practically declared that if his decision is to be appealed from it must be brought up for a hearing in that month. All eyes will be turned upon the appeal, for it cannot be disputed that its result will be looked upon by both sides as a pretty safe bet for the future.

The Laemmle interests have turned to advertising use the canard that was foisted upon a St. Louis paper to the effect that Miss Florence Lawrence, an actress who has posed for some time in moving pictures, was killed by an automobile in New York. The result is Miss Lawrence finds herself receiving more press notices than any other actress in the moving picture business. Well, to the credit of Miss Lawrence, be it said, that she did not require a hoax to draw attention to her. She is a mighty clever woman in pictures and her work had excited much flattering comment before she left the Biograph forces. I take this opportunity to express my sincerest gratification that the automobile did not get her.

That was an awful scare (?) some of the moving picture news writers gave the film renters. I refer to that $2,500,000 New Jersey corporation article. It was really funny to see how some of the film renters took it. "Lead me to it," said one of them when I asked him how he would like to have a part of the vast sum. Another said, "I am glad that the capital is a good-sized one. It shows that if the incorporators intend to gobble us up they realize that what we hold is worth something. If the capital amounted to only a few thousand I, for one, would have felt hurt at being held cheap."

I overheard a discussion over this gigantic scheme in a hotel lobby the other night. One of the parties was arguing that the reports in circulation were all bosh, the quoting of Lubin, the Philadelphia licensed manufacturer, as authority notwithstanding. "Why," said the speaker, "I'll bet Lubin is getting a heap of fun out of it. There isn't a more shrewd man in the country and I will not believe that when he gave the quoted interview he did not know what he was doing, and this being the case he would not do anything that might bring the wrath of the Patents Company upon his head. I have always contended, and I still contend, that reports circulated as to what the Motion Picture Patents Company is doing, or contemplates, must be accepted cautiously until they have some color of official sanction. The Patents Company is neither a bureau of information nor a news distributing agency. It is an incorporated company for the conducting of a certain line of business. Its affairs are private property and they are jealously guarded as such as in the cases of all other concerns, and nearly all the mad dog stories set afloat are originated for the purpose of drawing from the company some statement as to what it intends or does not intend to do in connection with some particular matter. Thowing aside all feeling and prejudice, the Patents Company must be given credit for being the most adept concern in the country in keeping the people guessing. I don't pretend to know the object of the New Jersey corporation, or its bearing upon, or connection with, the Patents Company, but common sense tells me that, even if the buying up of the film exchanges and dealing with the exhibitors is one of its objects, there is no danger of the plan being put in operation for some time to come. If it comes it will be a gigantic undertaking and the most difficult part of it will be the arrangement of the details. I know the matter has been talked of for some time, but take this tip from me—most of the talking is done outside the Patents Company by people who are only speculating."

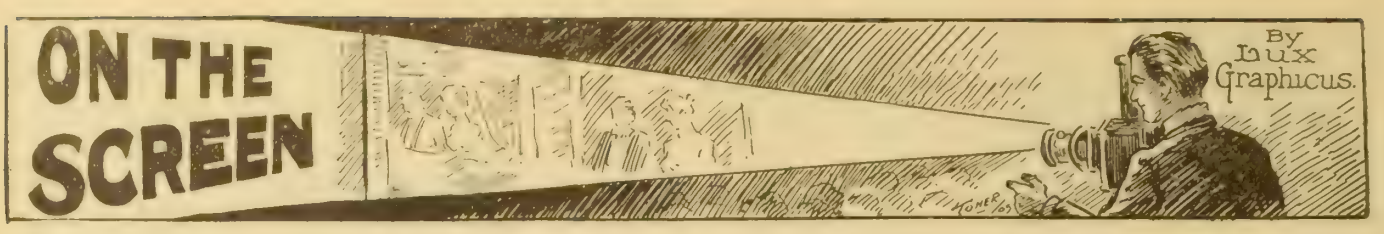
"If they don't intend to gather in the exchange business, why is it they are so careful not to disclose anything about the intentions of that New Jersey concern?" asked one of the listeners.

"Search me, I can only answer that by asking a question: Why did the licensed and the Independent film exchanges hold their last conventions at the same hotel in New York and at the same time?"



When lovely woman makes up her mind to do a certain thing my experience of the charming sex has taught me that if you do not want her to do it, try and persuade her out of it. And then she will go and do it. Encourage the dear creature in the particular course upon which she has set her mind—encourage her by all your arts of oratory and persuasion, and it is ten to one that she won't do it.

About the most determined specimen of femininity mere man, especially mere journalistic man, meets in his experiences, is the stagestruck young lady. The stagestruck young lady, dear brother and sister, has entered the moving picture field. A stagestruck young lady called upon me the other day with a letter of introduction from a friend. Mere cold printer's ink is inadequate to describe the personal charm of my fair visitor. She came, she saw, and she meant getting a letter of introduction to a producing friend. She got that letter of introduction, and off she sailed, proud of having secured her end.

Mere man being quite a clumsy tactician where lovely woman is concerned, I tried to dissuade my fair visitor from going on the stage. Whereupon she became more than ever determined to go on and I had to confess myself beaten. I see the error of my way now. What I should have done was to have taken the opposite course. Then there would have been some chance—and only some chance—of the honor of victory resting with me. On the other hand, it is probable that the man is not born who can successfully persuade a charming girl from going on the stage if she has made up her mind to do so. Like the officer who delivered the message to Garcia, she will "get there" at any cost. For sheer determination in having her own way when she has made up her mind to it, lovely woman easily outdistances mere man.

I was much interested in reading the other day the experience of the Vitagraph Company in regard to stagestruck aspirants. I can confirm the company's experience in a small way. The man who is connected with a newspaper which concerns itself with public amusement, is beset by many requests from youths and ladies, and even older people, for assistance in getting on the stage. Stage life looks so beautiful from the front of the house. Paint the discomfort of behind-the-scene work; rehearsing, traveling, dress changing, disappointment, failure, drudgery; paint it ever so grimly and luridly, it seldom has the desired effect of deterring the "stagestruck" from getting on the boards, or at any rate from making the attempt to get there. Even such a powerful man as Mr. Belasco may publish, as he has done many a time, deprecatory advice; even such famous players as Mary Anderson and Clara Morris, who have tasted the sweetest sweets of success, may issue warnings to their sisters not to think of going on the stage. They do not seem to have much effect. The string of aspirants shows no diminution. Applause and the glare of the footlights seem irresistible in their attractions to certain minds.

So I think I will reform my ways, and if any further applicants come to me, I will not venture to take up an attitude of opposition. What is the good? But can one legitimately hand out encouragement to the inexperienced—the merely physically qualified? Good looks and physique are, of course, useful equipments in stage work, but I fear that actors and actresses after all, like the poet, are born, not made. The records of all successful public performers seem to show that they had a natural bent for the work. This manifested itself in a natural way, and so success came. Which leads up to the reflection that the thousands and thousands of minor performers are merely intelligent mechanics, nothing more nor less, who respond to the exigencies of rigorous training and rehearsing.

Moving picture acting, so far as I have seen it, is very hard work. Just as hard as acting on the regular stage, without the added encouragement of applause and public recognition. Point this out to the stagestruck aspirant, and it does not seem to have any effect. I suppose it is that the love of playing is, in itself, of sufficient reward to these would-be stars of the silent stage. And certainly there is something attractive in the idea of a man or a woman playing a congenial part. But not all parts are or can be congenial. If everybody only played that which was congenial to him or her, some parts would never be played.

As there are about twenty film producing companies in the United States just now, it will be seen that the number of actors and actresses employed on the moving picture stage amount to quite a respectable total, constituting a considerable section of those who make entertainment work the business of their lives. That number is steadily on the increase, and it is tolerably sure that while these pictures attract the public they will also attract the stagestruck aspirant. There are probably many would-be imitators of Miss Lawrence, who has recently been so adroitly advertised in the newspapers.

Nothing appeals to the feminine heart so much as the wearing of nice dresses, and the opportunity of displaying them on the stage or elsewhere. Where there is the possibility of a girl being photographed in a moving picture and her portrait shown to millions of moving picture patrons, what wonder that the feminine heart aspires to have the opportunity? Here we are striking at the very root of feminine human nature: the love of finery, the love of display, the love of admiration. So it goes. So it will always go.

There is no doubt that the training which some of the young members of moving picture film companies are receiving will be valuable to them in after life if they decide to go on the regular stage. At present, however, we are without any direct evidence that such a result has been brought about. The game is too new. But I can quite imagine that as time progresses and the personalities of moving picture actors and actresses become fixed in the public mind, the excellence of their work will attract the attention of the great Broadway managers and others whom we are told are constantly on the lookout for exceptional talent. Perhaps this is another inducement to the stagestruck aspirant to seek a chance of appearing on the moving picture stage.

* * *

Consider for a moment what varied work the companies that were acting this Winter in the West and South—consider what very valuable and varied work these actors and actresses were doing. Here they were acting amidst natural surroundings—an opportunity which seldom falls to performers on the regular stage. If this policy of the film makers is to continue Winter by Winter and much outdoor acting to be done, I would not be a bit surprised if the moving picture stage did not, in the course of a few years, send some very valuable recruits to the ordinary stage.

After all, if there were no stagestruck boys and girls there would be very few actors and actresses. Successful stars now before the public had to go through the drudgery of hard work and disappointment before reaching a high rank. Reaching it, the sweets of success are very sweet, and as they are fond of talking about their successes, the newspapers give them publicity, and big bank balances and automobiles are amongst the rewards of their efforts. Perhaps, on the whole, it is not to be wondered that there is an unfailing stream of boys and girls who want to go and do likewise. I was successful once in my career in persuading some young people from going on the stage, by introducing them to a crowd of performers after a show. All the bright dresses, elegant costumes, wigs and the like had gone, and the performers were just plain, matter-of-fact men and women wrapped up for their homeward journey at night. They looked very unromantic as compared with what they did on the stage. And the lesson was not lost upon whom it was offered. They were not stagestruck, but I believe I am correct in saying that this little sight of the seamy side of stage life prevented their minds from ever becoming fatally influenced by the glare of the footlights. So you see there are some deterring influences at work. If it were not so, half the population would be stagestruck.

LOW GRADE VARIETY ACT ONE OBJECTION TO PICTURE SHOWS.

New or Unskilled Performers Furnish Interludes, Which Are Usually of a Cheap or Vulgar Character —Singing Pleasant.

[From the "Christian Science Monitor," Boston, Mass.]

One of the most objectionable features of the large majority of moving picture shows is the extremely low grade of variety acts that are given under the name of vaudeville between the pictures.

Under the present law no series of films can be shown uninterruptedly for a period longer than twenty minutes, and between each such period there must intervene a period of not less than five minutes, during which period some other form of entertainment must be provided.

In a few of the better class of moving picture houses especially those built and conducted under conditions that conform to the building laws governing theaters, the receipts are large enongh to permit the management to provide series of lectures illustrated with stereopticon slides, showing historical subjects and incidents of travel in foreign lands. In many such cases one-act sketches of good quality are also shown, as well as singers, whistlers and players of musical instruments. Such acts have a refinement that is most commendable for this class of entertainment.

Unhappily the very large majority of the shows in the cheaper theaters do not come up to this standard. Stereopticon lectures are regarded as a dull bore, so cheap variety acts are used in the intervals between the films.

These acts are performed by two classes of performers, generally speaking. They are either old performers whose talents have gradually fallen behind, or else they are wholly untrained beginners of small talent who are thus entering the amusement world.

The quality of the entertainment provided by these performers is of decidedly low grade. Many of the patrons of the picture shows are children who are having their first taste of theatrical entertainment, and never having seen talented people perform, they may get an idea that the rough, knockabout acts are as good as the stage affords.

It is impossible here to give any adequate idea of the vulgarity of some of the acts offered. It is an old theatrical trick to get a laugh with vulgarity when all else fails. Most of these performers being lacking in originality resort either to time-worn stories and minstrel jokes, or else fall back on "gags" and stories of a nature so objectionable that it is impossible even to hint at their nature in this paper.

Moreover, these questionable doings are not confined to the masculine performers. After one of the periodical emptyings of the hall or store that serves as a theater, the scores of children can be heard repeating the wretched jokes among themselves. Little girls talk glibly of subjects of which they would not dare speak at home.

The effect of such exhibitions on young people, children especially, is to harden them and familiarize them with criminal and vicious ideas that cannot but have a degrading effect upon their characters, when one realizes that the patron of the moving picture shows usually has the "habit," that is, goes at least once a week, and often two or three times.

The gregarious tendency in human nature is well understood and well worked upon by the providers of the moving picture shows. Sentimental illustrated songs are a popular feature. In these the performer sings the several verses to the accompaniment of stereopticon slides that visualize the scenes dwelt upon in the song. At the close the words of the chorus are thrown on the screen in letters large enough to be read in all parts of the hall, and the people in the audience all sing together.

Every provider of entertainment knows that this is one of the surest ways of making the audience enjoy itself, and it is probable that many visit the shows especially for the pleasure of the singing. The opportunities offered in the country, let us say, for neighbors to gather together for an evening of singing, or at the old-fashioned singing school, have no counterparts in the city, where there is little of the spirit of neighborliness in the country sense.

So it is that many seek the moving picture theaters for the sake of being where others are, to overcome the sense of loneliness that is the cause of so much unhappiness in the teeming city. This feature of the entertainment is usually unobjectionable, although the songs are often maudlin and false in sentiment, as well as being wholly uninspired as to melody and versification.

The acts in which musical instrument selections are played and the performances of prestidigitators, trained animals etc., are usually unobjectionable also, though of poor quality owing to the small remuneration.

It is the so-called monologue artist, the knockabout comedians, and flashy "sister acts" that provide chief cause for objection.

Just as it is almost inevitable that among the series of moving pictures shown there will be one or more depicting scenes of criminality and violence, so it is practically certain that every moving picture show, of the converted store variety at least, will contain one or more variety turns of a nature tending to have a degrading effect on those who witness them.

License Clerk Casey, who has charge of the issuing of licenses to moving picture shows in Boston, tells "The Monitor" that he prosecutes most rigid investigation into the character of every applicant for a moving picture license and the nature of the surroundings under which the exhibitions are to be given. Mr. Casey and others who have this work of supervision in charge are doing all they can within the present laws to make the conditions surrounding these exhibitions as good as possible.

THE AGFA SPECIAL DEVELOPER.

Continuing their policy of catering for the developing end of moving picture making, the Berlin Aniline Works, of 215 Water street, are putting out a special developer for moving picture films which we have no doubt will be popular with those having charge of darkroom work in moving picture factories. The developer is sent out in the form of powder, packed in airtight tins, ready for dissolving. One dollar sample set of this developer will make 400 ounces of solution if required. We would advise those of our readers employed in developing moving picture films, either positives or negatives, to send $1.00 to the Berlin Aniline Works for a sample of this Agfa special developer. Having regard to the excellent quality of all Agfa productions, we have no doubt that this developer will be found of great convenience and good quality by those who use it.

C. S. Abell, of Keokuk, Iowa, has just placed an order with J. H. Hallberg for one 500-volt direct current Economizer for the control of one moving picture lamp at 35 amperes in combination with double dissolving stereopticon. This Economizer will save over 85 per cent. on the current bill and will do away with the large rheostats usually required for 500 volts.

The unsteadiness of the pictures sent out by an American independent manufacturer who makes a specialty of depicting Western scenes in the wild woods of New Jersey, prompted us to ask him what camera he was using. He replied that it was a "Billiken." American independent manufacturers are no doubt handicapped in choice of apparatus, but we certainly can recommend the "Billiken" for producing unsteady pictures.

ADVERTISING VIA THE MOVING PICTURE.

By James H. Collins, in "Printers' Ink."

A new kind of advertising solicitor has lately appeared.

If you are in charge of an important general advertising expenditure, you will probably hear from his soon, with a pretty definite proposition.

Instead of the usual advertising plan, however, he will come to you with the plot of a play which he hopes to weave around your particular business or product. For he represents the moving picture interests, who have, within the past year, been developing the advertising possibilities of a remarkable new medium.

At the St. Louis Exposition, in 1904, several business houses maintained small theaters at their exhibits, showing moving pictures of a somewhat general character. Perhaps the nearest approach to anything of direct advertising value was a series of views inside the factory of the National Cash Register Company, with a lecture on its welfare work. A definite link with the product had not yet been established. It has remained for the man who is going to call on you to bring that about.

Every advertiser knows that, during the past two or three years, moving picture theaters have been established all over the United States. These five-cent entertainment places are springing up in the residence districts of great cities, and finding profitable patronage in the smallest country towns Numerous reasons are given for their popularity, the average man being satisfied with the explanation that they are cheap Price of admission doesn't tell the whole story, however. One highly important consideration to the advertiser is that these shows go into localities where there has been no entertainment before—city neighborhoods away from the regular theaters, and country towns where only the circus was to be seen, once a year. Another important consideration is, that the moving picture has a strong, basic human appeal During the season of 1897, when Edison's kinetoscope was new, two promoters bought the right to travel with Ringling's Circus, exhibiting the crude moving pictures of that day in a black tent which excluded the light. Their success was instant and remarkable. No advertising was done for this side-show, yet word seemed to travel on ahead, and through the West ranchmen, miners, soldiers, Chinamen and Indians flocked to see the novelty, paying their way into the black tent repeatedly.

Moving picture men are now bringing out the advertising possibilities of this medium and seem to have something of genuine merit, with wide future possibilities. One company in the East is adapting the pictures to advertising purposes, and another in the West is operating along the same lines. The writer talked recently with E. B. Miller, of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, who is in charge of the work for that company, and talked entertainingly about it.

Both of these concerns make regular entertainment films for the moving picture theaters. That is their main business. Advertising films are still a side issue.

It is said that there are to-day in the United States between 10,000 and 12,000 moving picture theaters, large and small. Figures revealing the number of persons who attend them daily are a little surprising, but the moving picture men prove "circulation" by laying bare the expenses of a small theater. Its manager rents films from concerns that supply him in competition. From one film renter he gets so many thousand feet of a certain kind of pictures, and from another so many thousand feet of something else. The service is not unlike that of a newspaper syndicate. His show is changed weekly, and sometimes daily, and he pays for live new films in many cases. Such a theater will take a service of 24,000 feet of film weekly, costing between $30 and $50 a week. Rent, light, advertising, singers, piano player, attendants, etc., run its expenses up to about $25 a day. Even a small theater, therefore, must entertain at least 500 people daily at five-cent admissions to meet net expenses, and if 10,000 theaters throughout the country entertained that many there would be an attendance of 5,000,000 each day. Some of the large houses entertain several thousand people daily.

Into this vast "circulation" the film concern can introduce pictures with semi-advertising themes, reaching between 600,000 and 1,000,000 people a week for a period of seven months. The latter period represents the life of a film on the circuits, after which it is called in, being scratched and worn. Only a portion of the whole moving picture audience is reached, because no single concern supplies its films to all the theaters. In fact, a company making the films does not deal with the theaters at all, their products being turned over to film renters who carry on that service. The theater exhibiting twenty-four subjects each week may use only one or two from a given film house, and so the "circulation" reached is smaller than the whole extent of the moving picture theater industry would indicate.

People pay to see these shows, and so advertising must be more or less secondary. The moving picture men frankly state that they are unable to give a glaring advertisement. Yet at the same time they can convey a general impression which is very lasting, and an admirable supplement to other advertising.

Take harvesters, for example.

The International Harvester Company has agents all over the world, and its goods are well known. The film manufacturers submit an outline of pictures to be taken, illustrating the building of a harvester, its journey to the fields, and its use in some locality where several dozen machines follow one another around wheat fields many miles square. Some of these views are taken in the factory, and perhaps the film men travel into foreign countries for other pictures that will be novel. The name of the company appears on its machines in the pictures, and is also shown in the "title" which precedes each picture. Such a film, sent out over the theater circuits, is exhibited for its human interest qualities alone. People pay to see it, and the theaters pay to use it.

For a golf ball manufacturer the Chicago house lately made a film showing the interior of the factory, with its five thousand employees, and these views were supplemented with pictures of Anderson playing crack golf out on the links Those pictures do not go into the theaters, however, but are shown privately at golf clubs throughout the country.

This brings in another use of moving pictures for advertising.

If the harvester interests prefer they can have a string of film made, showing their factory and products, and use it in connection with sales work. Picture machines and lecturers are sent out over the country, exhibiting in halls hired for the purpose, local selling agents for the machinery gathering audiences of farmers. This method gives a manufacturer the center of the stage, as it were, and instead of a general impression upon miscellaneous audiences, as in the theaters, he makes a selling impression on picked prospects Manufacturers like the great food advertisers, who carry on costly sampling and demonstrating work with traveling crews, can use moving pictures in the same way, working the local retail trade and dressing the windows at the same time, mixing moving pictures with samples.

Still another interesting use has been found for the pictures in cases where costly, elaborate machinery is to be shown to one or two prospective purchasers.

About a year ago a Western company making heavy excavating and hoisting apparatus, had films taken for use by its salesmen. A contract for excavating machinery is about to be let by a railroad that is leveling and straightening its roadbed. Obviously, it would help the sale if the manufacturer's salesman could take that road's purchasing agent out to see his machinery at work. But perhaps the nearest plant actually in operation is 500 miles off. The purchasing agent is a busy man. A salesman could get him out for a tour of inspection hardly once in a dozen times. But he has a thousand feet of moving picture film in his grip, showing a typical excavating plant at work. Before calling on his prospect he leaves this film at some small theater in the neighborhood, giving the manager a couple of dollars to run it off as a part of the regular show when he is asked to do so. These theaters are so widely scattered nowadays that it is seldom hard to make such an arrangement. Then, after talking with the purchasing agent, the salesman invites him out for an hour to see his machinery at work, taking him to this theater. Results that have followed the use of one film taken for this company a year ago, employed in this way, have been so good that films are now being made for all its large machinery.

The moving picture men are also working on a small apparatus which will enable selling agents or manufacturers to exhibit moving pictures of heavy machinery in their own offices. Some difficulty has been found owing to the fire risk from films, as insurance companies hesitate to give permission for their use in office buildings where such a small moving picture machine would be employed for sales purposes. This difficulty is being solved by the development of unburnable film—film made of a composition which will crumple when a flame is applied, but will not flame itself.

Some estimates of cost for moving picture service were prepared by Mr. Miller. When suitable subjects have been agreed upon, the film company charges a dollar per foot for the original negative and the first positive, and fifteen cents a foot for additional positives. The positives, of course, correspond to photographic prints, and are necessary for exhibition in moving picture machines. The film company keeps the negatives, under contract not to use. Films average about 1,000 feet—that will tell a very complete story. In addition, there are expenses of operators when it is necessary to travel to different places, assembling various parts of the film story. This price applies only to outdoor views. Where indoor pictures are taken it is necessary to install portable mercury vapor lights for illumination, and the cost in such work is so much greater than no contract for less than $2,500 worth of film is taken. For $5,000, roughly, it is possible to arrange a complete business story, photograph it, make sufficient positive copies, and put it out among the moving picture theaters all over the United States for seven months, reaching an audience estimated at between 15,000,000 and 25,000,000 persons.

CONDITIONS IN THE SOUTH.

HARRY SCHWALBE.

Mr. Harry Schwalbe, of the Electric Theater Supply Company, of Philadelphia, one of the best known film exchange men in the East, has just returned from an extended tour through the South. Mr. Schwalbe, who is a keen observer, speaking of conditions in the South, expressed himself freely to a representative of The Moving Picture World.

"The attempt to mix cheap vaudeville with moving pictures," said Mr. Schwalbe, "has proved disastrous to the moving picture industry in the South. I doubt whether any one of the houses which still maintain vaudeville is at present a paying venture. The only really prosperous places are the 'straight' moving picture theaters. Take, for an example, the city of Augusta, Ga. About two years ago, before the vaudeville craze had struck the town, there were six prosperous moving picture houses, to-day there are only three left. Savannah, in the same State, a prosperous town, is to-day without any moving picture entertainment, while but a couple of years ago it supported several such places. The vaudeville craze has run the business there completely into the ground. Similar conditions prevail in Macon, Ga., Charlotte, N. C., Spartansburg, S. C., Atlanta, Ga. In Columbia, S. C., where not less than two years ago they had five or six prosperous moving picture houses, there is to-day but one left, the Lyric, and that from appearance may die over night. The same story—it was the blight of cheap vaudeville. This theater, with a seating capacity of over 1,000, was running the junkiest kind of punk. In Durham, N. C., vaudeville has resulted in loss of popular favor and patronage and the closing down of two places within recent time. In Wilmington, N. C., and Richmond, Va., conditions are slightly better, but vaudeville of the frankfurter variety is losing its hold there. In Florida there is likewise a favorable reaction from hook-worm vaudeville, which there has almost run its course. In Jacksonville almost all houses charge 10 cents and one, 'The Majestic,' charges 10 and 20 cents. St. Augustine, which at this time of the years is crowded beyond the capacity even of its numerous hotels, has the 'Jefferson' for its principal theater and conditions there are good.

"Most places change at least one reel daily and some change daily with a two and three-reel program. The pictures are what we in the North would consider old for large cities. There is but little of a date newer than two weeks and by far the greatest part is older than one month."

In his travels through Virginia, Mr. Schwalbe, at Norfolk, Va., met Mr. Horace S. Peed, formerly of Philadelphia, and now active in the moving picture houses South of the Mason and Dixon line. Mr. Peed agrees with Mr. Schwalbe in regard to the pernicious effect of tramp vaudeville on the moving picture entertainment.

W. S. B.

The Great Western Film Company, of San Francisco, have made the pictures of the Nelson-Wolgast lightweight championship, of forty rounds, some of the pictures being taken as late as 6 p. m. and all perfect. We believe this is the first prize fight that has been made by an independent manufacturer. The film will be handled by the promoters of the fight.

CHICAGO NOTES.

Mr. Harry F. Bryan, of the Motion Picture Screen Company, of Shelbyville, Ind., is in town and sold a Mirror Screen to the Garfield Theater, Fifty-fifth and Halstead streets, also one to the Elite Theater, Forty-seventh street and Indiana avenue. Both screens will be in place within a few days and will be the means of many more sales, as a number of exhibitors are waiting to see a practical demonstration, before placing their orders.

The Mirror Screen, associated with appropriate music and good sound effects, will form a strong combination against cheap vaudeville and, unless the young stagestruck folks find employement with regular vaudeville houses, they will have to return home, to make a living at farming, as the motion picture theaters will be closed to them.

The following fine program is an example of how a careful film exchange, like the American Film Service, can take care of their patrons in making up a show to please the different tastes and fancies. The program included the dramatic, the comic, the educational, one counterbalancing the other.

The masterpiece was the Pathe Freres film, "The Violin Maker of Cremona." To say the truth, I was not much inclined to see the film, as a friend, who had seen it in the early afternoon, had made a rather queer report, something as follows: "It is the good photography and the clever acting of Pathe Freres, but the whole thing is not clear and too noisy." After questioning him, he told me that by "noisy" he referred to the music, which was entirely out of place and spoiled the picture.

If my friend had gone to the Orpheum his report would have been a different story, as there the music was soft and appropriate. When Philippo, the poor wounded fiddler, plays a few notes to show that the violin is perfect, the orchestra stops, the violinist only plays a few sweet notes and stops as soon as the bow on the screen stops touching the violin strings. The illusion is complete, the music seems to come from the violin shown on the screen, and the notes are such that the audience joins in praises to the ones shown on the screen.

The orchestra stops again and the violinist is the only one playing, when Sandro is shown trying his violin to the delight of his sweetheart and of her father. The notes are eloquent, they fully justify the pride of the maker and of his friends, but they are still more eloquent when they represent Philippo in the gardens, playing on his hand-made violin. The notes fully illustrate the verdict of Sandro, of his master and of his sweetheart, when they all realize that Philippo's violin is the best in tone.

The music made the difference. It seems that the members of the orchestra at the Orpheum put their soul in the pictures.

Essanay came next with "The Egg Trust" and "Rags, Old Iron." Well, if while "The Violin Maker" was on the screen the audience was so attentive and captivated as to hear a pin drop, they woke up at the comical features of the Essanay films. The Essanays have certainly the talent to make you laugh against your own will. The antics of the two boys, cheating the rag dealer out of his bargain, made it a very hard thing for many of the spectators to keep on their seats and the general hilarity was of the most sanguine nature and just the thing to chase away the blues.

To cool down the audience we were shown the "Leather Industry," a very interesting educational film.

The educational films are coming to the front, they are no more objected to, but they rather seem to be in demand and they please. "The Industries of Southern California," of Selig, shown the other day, made a great hit and the 1,000 feet did not seem to tire but called for much appreciation on the part of the spectators. The ladies were greatly interested in the ostriches and feathers.

As everything is good in small quantity, we do not want an abuse of the industrial films, as the programs would then be too monotonous.

The same can be said of the dramatic and of the comic. In the above program I greatly enjoyed "The Violin Maker of Cremona," yet, if instead of having been treated to an industrial film, we had been given two dramatic productions the chances are that the second one would have destroyed the good impression of the first one.

The above named program is a good composition to please everyone and at the same time not tire on one theme. The exchanges should try to follow the same line of service and by so doing they would certainly improve the business.

J. B. Clinton, of the Unique Film Service, 81 Clark street, Chicago, Ill., has purchased the stock of the Superior Film Supply Company, of Toledo, Ohio, and will continue to operate it in the present offices in the Colonnade Building, Toledo, Ohio, with E. Boardman in charge as manager.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Current and Rheostat.—Kansas City, Mo., wants to know how much current he will get through two 18-ampere rheostats in multiple, with two in series on a loop, pressure 110 volts. Presumably he means that one end of the loop is connected ahead of the multiple and the other behind—that is to say, one end is connected to the wire between the two in multiple and the main switchboard and the other between the two in multiple and the lamp, so that he will get the full current of the multiple, also the full amount supplied by the series. Through each rheostat in multiple he will, of course, get the capacity of the coils, viz., 18 amperes, or 36 for the two. Through the series he will get about 10½ amperes. It is figured as follows: Seventy volts pressure divided by 10 amperes gives 3 1-3 ohms resistance to the rheostat, or 6.66 ohms for both. Seventy volts divided by 6.66 gives approximately 10½ amperes, the current flow through the two rheostats in series. The total current then would be 36 plus 10½, or 46½ in all. The reason for using 70 for the voltage is that the arc itself gives about 40 to 45 volts drop, leaving 70 to 75 to be taken care of by the rheostat.

Projection Troubles.—Pittsburg, Pa., writes, in part, as follows: "I take the liberty of addressing you to see if you can locate my trouble. You are helping others, and I thought I would cast my lot with theirs. Am using Power's No. 5 machine, purchased last September, and from eighteen inches to two feet of the left side of the picture appears very rainy."

Frankly, your case has puzzled me more than anything which has come up in a long time, but I have finally concluded you are probably mistaken in calling what you see on the screen "rain-marks." I am inclined to believe it is your shutter which is at fault and that you have what we call a travel ghost on a small portion of the picture. This is white streaks flashing up, down, or both, especially noticeable on titles. It is the result of the shutter being set wrong or else too narrow. Now, I want you to make the following experiments, carefully noting results, and report to me:

First, throw the clear, white light on screen with machine standing still. If you notice the streaks, then the trouble is either in the screen (curtain) itself or in the projection lens. Next put in a film, frame clear down, and run a few feet, carefully noting the result. Next, frame clear up, run a few more feet of film and carefully note results. Next, frame midway and do the same. Examine shutter carefully and see if there are, by chance, any holes in it or if it appears that any of the shutter has been cut off. Rain-marks are produced by scratches in the film and I know of nothing else that will produce them. Holes in the shutter might possibly make a sort of imitation. I shall await your report with decided interest.

Getting a White Screen.—Clay City, Ill., asks what is the matter when there is a dark spot (ghost) in center of curtain, which may be removed by pulling lamp back from condensers, but when this is done there is a dark circle around the outer edge of picture. He asks if the picture (12 x 14 at 56 feet) is too large for the throw.

No, the picture is not too large for the throw. You have a 3½-inch projection lens and should have two 6½ condenser lenses. Measure your condenser lenses and see what they really are. Pin a white sheet of paper to a wall opposite a window. Hold lens with flat side to wall and move back and forth until a clear, sharply defined picture of the window is propected on the paper. Then measure from flat surface of lens to the wall. This will be the focal length of the lens, which should be about 6½ inches in your case for both lenses. Before getting other lenses, however, try sliding your lamp-house forward and back. A ghost may sometimes be removed thus. It is also barely possible the trouble is in your projection lens itself, but I do not think so.

Condenser Breakage.—Santa Paula, Cal., asks what to do to stop his condensers breaking. Says he has tried 6½ and 7½ lenses, but does not tell me his picture size and throw, therefore I cannot say what focal length condenser he should have. Says room has no draughts and he has tried covering lamp-house with asbestos box, but lenses break as fast as he can put them in. Says lenses are loose in ring. It is wellnigh impossible to tell, sometimes, just what is causing condenser lenses to break, even when one is right there. It is likely, however, that there is excessive heat in your lamp-house, and this excess may be caused by failure to clean out the screen in top of lamp-house. Evidently you have tried to avoid practically all ventilation of lamp-house. Try ample ventilation once. More condenser lenses are broken by lack of lamp-house ventilation than by too much. Clean out the screen in top of lamp-house, and, if not forbidden by local law, open up the back of the lamp-house as well—wide open, if you can. There is no more danger of setting anything on fire by the back of the lamp-house being open than there is of setting fire to the Atlantic Ocean. But with ample ventilation have the vent holes in condenser mount open, also.

You ask directions for making temporary announcement slides. You will find directions on page 337, March 5th issue, for making very satisfactory slides with a typewriter. They may also be written or printed on glass with a fine pen and India ink, first thoroughly cleaning the glass. Also they may be punched out of cardboard with one of the letter-perforating machines.

Machine Adjustments.—New York City, N. Y., propounds the following, all on one lonesome postal card. I will answer by number: (1) Is it advisable to set the flywheel in tight against the bushing or leave some slack? (2) Should the intermittent sprocket be set in tight against the apron, or a little loose? (3) How often do the eccentric bushings wear out? (4) Is 3 in 1 oil suitable for safety shutter? (5) How often should the entire machine be oiled?

(1) Set it in tight, but not so as to bind. (2) Don't know what you mean. (3) Depends on hours you run the machine per day and grade of oil, etc. Renew them whenever the shaft gets loose in the bearing. (4) I never oil the fire shutter itself; it is not necessary. The actuating mechanism should be oiled and the oil you name is all right for that purpose. (5) Depends on circumstances. Aside from the intermittent, which should have a drop of oil every 2,000 feet of film, any moving picture machine bearing ought to run ten reels of film, at least, without oil, assuming that good oil is used. This does not apply to some makes of fire-shutter governors, however. Use judgment and common sense in the matter of lubrication. No hard and fast rule can be laid down.

F. H. RICHARDSON.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"The Millionaire's Adventure" (Lubin).—A lively and interesting little skit, representing a girl driven from home by brutality, falling in with a supposed tramp, who turns out to be a millionaire in disguise. The girl, disguised as a boy, travels with the supposed tramp for a month. Then he goes back home, taking his companion with him, where her sex is disclosed. The usual result follows and everybody probably lives happily ever after. The picture is alive and touches upon a theme which is common enough and which might readily prove to be a basis for an extraordinary interest. With the life that the Lubin players put into it the picture is satisfactory and not infrequently is heartily applauded.

"Samuel of Posen" (Selig).—This picture is certain to be exceptionally popular. Probably a considerable proportion of comedy patrons have seen or have heard of M. B. Curtiss in his original role as "Sammy." It was a master stroke when Selig secured, not alone the rights to the play, but Mr. Curtiss as well. The picture starts in Posen, Germany, and after numerous and exciting adventures in different parts of the world, including a pre-arranged fire sale in Baxter street, New York, the picture goes back again to old Posen. There are both humor and pathos, each contributing a portion to the interest of the picture. The acting is sympathetic, offering many touches which increase the strength of the film and add to its popularity. The photography is adequate, and assists in the wholesome interpretation of the story.

"The Girl Thief" (Kalem).—This is a strong melodramatic picture, with plenty of romance, sympathetically acted by the firm's Southern stock company. It is a story of a thief's reformation through a clergyman's love, and presents in the telling a good many dramatic and interesting situations. Like all these plays from the Kalem studio, the development of the plot is strongly dramatic, holding the interest of the audience by causing them to wonder what is going to occur next. The scene is laid in the South and carries with it the picturesque features common to that locality, but which seem, when properly introduced, to add a stronger touch of romance than is possible under most other conditions. The Kalem people have always used these backgrounds to good advantage, adding materially to the attractiveness and interest of their pictures.

"History of a Sardine Sandwich" (Vitagraph).—An interesting industrial picture, showing the life history of a sardine sandwich from the beginning to the end. The increase in the number of industrial films released recently indicates the larger number of people who like these pictures. And industrial subjects are endless, each one of which possesses its own share of interest and conveys its own topic of information It is evidence of the improving taste of motion picture audiences, and it is to be commended upon the score of assisting in the education of the people.

"Brittany Lassies" (Pathe).—A comedy which introduces some picturesque and attractive features of Brittany life and is sufficiently amusing to keep the audience in good humor The acting and photography are alike good.

"The Eleventh Hour" (Edison).—An intensely dramatic and highly emotional picture, representing the struggle of a governor against the desire to pardon a condemned murderer who has been reported as the governor's son. The struggle between the father and the governor is one of the best bits of acting seen in a motion picture in weeks. And then the climax, when the son suddenly appears, leading an upright life. There is a power in plays of this character, which appeal irresistibly by their intense humanity. It is impossible to describe them, or to convey any conception of their strength, but the spectators closely followed the keen struggle between love and duty and did not fail to show their appreciation at the end.

"The Man Under the Bed" (Edison).—A comedy of the boisterous order, capable of keeping an audience roaring throughout its length. It is built upon the timeworn assertion that old maids always look under the bed to see if there is a man in hiding, and this one, when she discovers a pair of shoes, rouses the entire house to assist her in dragging the intruder out. The ending is quite romantic, since when the owner of the shoes appears she seems quite satisfied with him and there is shortly an ending which did not seem possible at the beginning.

"Poet of the Revolution" (Gaumont).—An interesting bit of drama, acted with all the intelligence and skill usually displayed in the work of this firm's players and photographers. The play is interesting, the actors are sympathetic, and the film will appeal to a large number in different ways.

"The Ostrich and the Lady" (Essanay).—An important addition to the long and growing list of educational films. This one gives characteristic scenes on a Los Angeles ostrich farm and illustrates, in an interesting and definite way, the development of ostrich farming. Many of the scenes are picturesque, and all are novel, adding to the interest of the picture. The photography is clear, even in those scenes in which rapid movement might lead to blurring. Altogether it is an interesting picture, giving information about ostrich farming in an entertaining way.

"The Ranch Girl's Legacy" (Essanay).—A Western comedy, acted with all the snap and dash for which the Essanay players are known. It is a picture which will interest, not only for the interesting story it tells, but for the representation of certain phases of Western life which form a considerable portion of the picture. The love story connected with it adds to the interest.

"Pierrot" (Pathe).—An interesting picture. The excellent work of the already famous house of Pathe is becoming better known each day. Their character studies, and their depiction of bits of life, are always interesting; nor does this picture detract from the reputation of those who made it.

"Beautiful Snow" (Vitagraph).—A laughing comedy which is not only rich in humor, but develops some sparkling and funny situations. It is acted with the Vitagraph's careful attention to details, and this has its effect in increasing the interest which attaches to the film.

"The Thread of Destiny" (Biograph).—A pretty story, containing much of suggestion and much of real life. Probably many have had dreams, have longed for something they couldn't explain, something that would take them out of this life and into some other, or so change this life that it would be like another. It isn't always possible to explain these longings, common to all mankind. The Biograph Company has expressed them strongly in this picture, pointing out in an unusually graphic manner the human tendency in the young orphan girl's heart. Next follows the love story, beautiful and romantic, and the interposition of the picturesque Western touch. The villain is satisfactorily foiled, however, and the lonely girl strolls away with her new husband, the previous unexplained longings satisfied. The scenery, representing the San Gabriel valley, is beautiful, while acting and photography are both of a high standard. A very satisfactory number, which shows that the Biograph Company have got down to business in their new sphere.

"Marriage in Haste" (Lubin).—Numerous stories of elopements have been told, but here is a novelty in the fact that the girl's father, pursuing the eloping couple, is mistaken for the eloper because he has a little girl with him, and only for the timely return of his new son-in-law he would have been lynched by the mob. There is a long list of incidents, each funnier than the last, and each one good for a laugh. The acting is in harmony with the mixed-up story, and the photography is clear and good. This is one of the best comedies Lubin has released recently.

"Tragic Idyl" (Pathe).—A simple love story, involving a broken promise, a maddened father and a tragedy, but the film is a marvel of beauty, color, light and shade. Perhaps the story it tells may seem hackneyed, but the beauty of the pictures presented more than compensates for any lack of strength in the story. It will long be remembered for this when possibly the somewhat commonplace story will be forgotten.

"Strenuous Massage" (Pathe).—Maybe few would care to take such vigorous treatment for rheumatism as this unfortunate individual received, even though the twinges were severe. A shower bath from an overflowing gutter, a plunge bath in a bucket, massage from two policemen and a road-roller. These all combined make what might be termed very vigorous treatment; yet the patient testified that he felt better after it.

"Told in the Golden West" (Selig).—The Western pictures coming from this house are remarkably good interpretations of the life they are supposed to depict; in fact, one can obtain an accurate impression of some interesting phases of Western life by looking at a Selig picture; and the series of recent releases makes a wonderfully good record. This one is no exception to the rule., and, in the opinion of experts, will undoubtedly add to the already high reputation of the house.

"The Right Decision" (Edison).—The story opens with a scene on the battlefield of Waterloo, very graphically presented, giving a clear view of the horrors of war. There is a complication of difficulties arising from the attempt of the son of a captain who was assisted on that field to find the one who aided him. A love story is interwoven, showing how the captain's son finds a beautiful girl while engaged in the search for the benefactor, who, to make the story still more complicated, turns out to be a thief. The picture is well acted and beautifully staged, with photography quite in keeping with the subject and the careful manner in which it is worked out.

"My Milliner's Bill" (Edison).—A comedy in which the extravagance of a young wife for elaborate hats is effectively cured by the husband, who is a good amateur actor. The fun is of the subtle type that amuses without offending and the attractive complications which arise are all satisfactory additions to the play, making it as delicious as possible. The acting is clever, the photography is excellent, and the entire picture is satisfactory.

"A Brother's Devotion" (Vitagraph).—A story which illustrates in a very dramatic way how one brother made a heroic sacrifice to help another. It is a well-told tale of brotherly love, which perhaps would have more strength if it were more common in everyday experience. It is well acted, with much attention to details, and the story is worked out with care. Photographically, little improvement could be desired. A few weak places appear, but they are insufficient to mar the picture. It is, on the whole, satisfactory and is strong enough to play on the emotions more than some of them do.

"Interrupted Honeymoon" (Essanay).—Here is one of those snappy comedies, played in the liveliest way by the company's capable actors, certain to amuse any audience. The numerous startling situations and complications into which the honeymooners plunged, one after another, never fails to keep the people who see the picture thoroughly interested.

"Her Soldier Sweetheart" (Kalem).—After seeing this picture twice one feels constrained to say that it will probably rank as one of the best among the many good ones the Kalem people have turned out recently. The dramatic possibilities are many, and are carefully and consistently worked out, with no forcing of scenes to secure an adequate climax. The photographer rose to the requirements of the subject and did his work even better than he has been doing lately. There are passages where the dramatic strength of the picture is unusual and the actors have imbibed the spirit of the scenes and do some remarkable work in interpretation. With all the elements in its favor the prediction is made that this film will prove exceptionally popular; and it is certain to enhance the reputation of the producing company.

"At the Bar of Justice" (Urban).—A strongly dramatic picture, acted with sympathy and with the attention to details which characterizes the work of the Urban players. The photographic department satisfactorily performed its part of the work, and the result is a picture which will appeal by its development of human sympathies and its strong telling of a dramatic story.

"The Water Flyer" (Urban).—A scenic record film, prepared with the care which characterizes the work of this company. The operators understand how to select the most picturesque viewpoint, adding much to the attraction of the films in so doing. So much depends upon the proper selection of a viewpoint for scenic pictures, particularly when rapidly moving objects are included, that a firm is to be congratulated who has as good an operator as Urban.

"A Victim of Bridge" (Edison).—The consequences of over-indulgence in this fashionable diversion are clearly portrayed in this picture from the Edison studio. The acting is good and convincing and the photography is clear, and the picture keeps the audience interested throughout its length.

"His Fears Confirmed" (Gaumont).—A bit of good dramatic work, supplemented by good photography. Some of the scenic effects are very beautiful, showing a mass of picturesque features which add materially to the picture and what it represents.

"The New Partner" (Bison).—The interest in this picture will center chiefly in the strike scene, which is probably one of the greatest strike pictures ever put upon the screen. The stirring scene is adequately staged and admirably acted and the surroundings seem interpretative of what the subject suggests. To be able to reproduce a scene of this character is an achievement worth noting and emphasizes the fact that the Bison Company is doing some excellent work. The company which acted this film had special training for the work and the results are quite in keeping with the care which is apparent in the firm's recent output.

"The Electric Bathtub" (Pantograph).—This farce from a comparatively new company is boisterous, but contains some novel features certain to please. The experiences of the unfortunates who undertake to use the tub are amusing enough to keep the audience laughing throughout the entire length of the film. The photography is quite satisfactory, showing only occasional weak places. But it is the kind of comedy which older concerns have mostly discarded. It has had its day, and that day is past. There is enough of such stuff on the market now, and a new producer, to claim attention and patronage, must of necessity work on more original and progressive lines.

"A Wedding During the French Revolution" (Great Northern).—Here is a drama by Sophus Michaelis, the famous Danish playwright. It is being produced at a well-known New York theater under another title, with a favorite actor in the title role. It is a strongly dramatic production, and as acted by the Great Northern company it is certain to attract much favorable attention. The photographer has performed his part of the work to perfection, and the finished film leaves nothing to be desired. The adequate presentation of films of this character does much to overcome the adverse criticism aimed at the motion picture theater by ignorant and misguided critics. The Great Northern people deserve commendation for their good service in producing this film. The author of the book, at present in this city, warmly complimented the Great Northern representative on the excellence of the production.

"Supreme Recognition" (Itala).—A picture possessing marked dramatic qualities, sympathetically acted, and telling a beautiful and touching story of a mother's love for her children..

"The Cage" (Eclair).—A story of a buccaneer's love for a young woman whose guardian has other plans for his ward. However, the elopement would have got on famously, only the guardian discovered the plot and imprisoned the chief. He is released by his fellows, the marriage is consummated, and all goes well ever after. The acting is sympathetic, there is plenty of lively work, and the photography is quite satisfactory. Withal it is an interesting film.

"The Indian and the Cowgirl" (Bison).—A Western picture, breathing the rough life of the plains and developing a story of interest and power. The most thrilling scene is where the cattle rustlers fasten the child on the horse's back and send the beast careering over the plains. But the mother has befriended an Indian, rescuing him from this same gang of rustlers, and when she gives the alarm he is first to respond. Then come some wild riding, ending by the discovery of the horse bearing the child and his capture by the dextrous use of the lasso. It is thrilling and redolent with the true plains spirit. Photographically it is an improvement over some previous Bison work.

"The New Minister" (Imp).—The subject offers a clue to the picture, but, of course, it does not disclose the many interesting details. Very much of human nature is depicted in this film, and it is so well done that practically everyone who sees it is ready to applaud vigorously. Like all Imp films, it has an element which appeals strongly to the alert mind, representing the peculiarities of humanity in a very graphic way. The acting is lively; perhaps, in some scenes, too lively. The photography is clear, and good tonal qualities are reproduced in the film. The pictures sent out by this house are improving steadily. That they are popular admits of no doubt. The intensely human, and therefore satisfying subjects, appeal to a large number of theatergoers and insure interested audiences wherever they are shown. The firm is to be congratulated upon the increasing popularity of its output.

"On the Little Big Horn" (Nestor) was the title on a lavish poster display that attracted us into a theater on Sixth avenue. The picture on the screen when we entered was an Eclair. This was followed by another European film with no imprint, and then by an old Pathe. A good projecting machine did justice to the good photography and steadiness of all these pictures, so we patiently awaited the headliner of the day. "On the Little Big Horn" at last had its inning. The story, if there was a story, seemed to seize upon every available plot on which a drama could be based. There was love, jealousy, heroism, infidelity, revenge, mistaken identity or false accusation, and the inevitable happy ending. This was put on with an attempt at a fire scene, a rescue and some fast riding and display of cowboy attire to give it a Western flavor. Much of the acting was good, but somehow it failed to convince, as the jumbled situations had little in common and the producer failed to carry his story over the footlights by endeavoring to crowd in too much. The film will no doubt please many theatergoers. The bravado and the skillful riding of the cowboys, the chivalrous sentiment that prevails, will satisfy the average audience. But the story, as a specimen of the straining after effect in the modern picture drama, leads us to ask elsewhere, "What of the future?"

"A Father's Patriotism" (Lux).—War pictures are apparently increasing in popularity. At least they are increasing in number. Here is one of those touching pictures that somehow go straight to the heart and arouse the same impulses they depict so graphically. The dramatic qualities of this film are excellent, heightened, perhaps, in some degree, by their appeal to the imagination, which helps one to see beyond the pictures and observe something which stirs emotions otherwise dormant. All these things help, and the effect is to create a favorable impression of the picture.

"He Knew Best" (Lux).—A picture calculated to chase care away and develop the risibles in almost anyone. It is a story of what may be termed borrowed plumes and is strongly amusing as it runs.

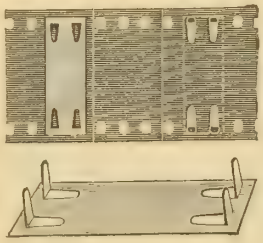
"The Actor's Children" (Thanhouser).—A most excellent beginning for a new concern. The story is clear and clean and the acting very good indeed in some scenes. There is, however, too much evidence of the production having been put on by a man whose experience has been gained on the living stage. Cutting out one or two scenes and substituting printed titles would improve the film and less time should be given to the supposedly speaking parts. No doubt this is also evident to the producer after seeing the story on the screen, where action speaks louder than words, and the fault will be remedied in the future. In fact it has already been much corrected in "St. Elmo," the second picture of the new company, to be issued this week. In photography the work ranks well with that of older concerns and is far superior to some. "The Actor's Children" is a film that will please.

"Governor's Pardon" (Imp).—A rather incongruous story but carried by good acting and good photography. If there is one thing in particular on which the Imp Company is to be complimented, it is that their stories are clean, and while the dramatic element is not lacking, there is not the straining after lurid scenes and exciting situations favored by others. Another excellent Imp film is "Mother Love," which deserves all the praise it has received. We have sat beside a censorship committee inspecting the Imp productions and heard the remark that no films required less pruning. One of the Imp dramas of early release will have on the same reel a short but wonderfully good exhibition of ice skating and obstacle jumping by one of the champion ice skaters of the world.

"Foolshead, Chief of Reporters" (Itala).—Foolshead appears again in a film certain to cause everyone who sees it to laugh. Foolshead is a character that appeals to the average person as irristibly funny and creates a long laugh, lasting from the time the film starts until it closes.

"Town Traveler's Revenge" (Itala).—A film of rather broad humor and somewhat addicted to the rough house order, yet quite likely to be popular with most audiences. It is recommended as a welcome addition to the list of live humorous productions.

OF INTEREST TO THE TRADE.



From G. Gennert, 26 East Thirteenth street, New York, we have received samples of the Temporary Film Fastener, a useful and much needed little device which we do not hesitate to commend to our readers. It is a flat strip of aluminum or brass the width of the film, with four prongs which are inserted into two sprocket holes on each side and then turned down. In the event of a break or in the assembling of a film we can conceive of no more useful aid, or more economical, as it does away with the waste by the clumsy method of pinning the ends together and also the danger of blood poisoning from pin pricks. When ready to cement the joints the prongs are easily bent backwards and the picture is not damaged. It is a contrivance that will save time, temper and money and received the instant endorsement of a film exchange proprietor to whom we showed it. Manufacturers will also find it very useful in the joining room. We understand that the film fasteners are furnished in aluminum at $3.50 per 1,000, or brass at $4 per 1,000.

One of the latest improvements for the moving picture theater is an invention by V. C. Seaver, proprietor of the Alcazar Theater, 108 East Madison street, Chicago. This is a compound combined with a specially prepared cloth for a screen which tends to heighten the luminosity value of the picture. Even at a throw of 120 feet the picture stands out with wonderful brightness. The inventor has been experimenting upon this for the past six months, which has entailed upon him a large amount of money to get it to this state of perfection. He has applied for a patent both in this country and Europe and, if successful in securing it, he will be in a position to give the exhibitor a screen that will exceed some of those at present in vogue, at the low price of 50 cents per square foot.

Oshkosh, Wis.—The Colonial is the name of a new moving picture theater, at 153 Main street. Jesse V. Hogan is the manager. The films are supplied by the Laemmle Film Service, which disproves the old saying that a prophet is not without honor, save in his own country, for Mr. Laemmle hails from Oshkosh. The new theater has a seating capacity of 365 and is of substantial construction and beautiful design. The system of ventilation is specially good.

The Arcanum Theater, at Jackson and Clinton avenues, Jersey City, was sold under the hammer recently to satisfy a judgment for non-payment of rent. There can be no sympathy in this case as it is a repetition of the old story. The parties interested had no knowledge whatever of the business and squatted into a neighborhood that was already overloaded with picture shows. They were going to set the world on fire and commenced under overwhelming expense in the matter of vaudeville, reels, help and rent. As is always the way in cases like this, they did themselves no good and hurt the old exhibitors, consequently there is no one to mourn the loss. Moral—Don't butt in.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

A memoranda of the good things to be served by the Vitagraph experts are: "Capital vs. Labor," a great drama of national interest and aptness, on March 22; "The Hand of Fate," another drama of one of life's greatest truths in which the characters and scenery portray the rugged beauty of life among the mountain fastnesses of the Carolinas, on March 25; "The Broken Spell," a society drama of surpassing charm and bewitching attractiveness, on March 29; "The Tongue of Scandal," to be released on April 1, characterizes a peculiar phase of human nature and a type of mentality common to small communities where gossip forms the chief budget and very often leads to near tragedies of social ruin and destruction of character. "The Fruits of Vengeance," the evidence of how great a matter a little fire kindleth. An everyday occurrence with a practical moral, a family feud and a division of a neighborhood by a children's quarrel, the growth of a mountain from a mole hill. These last two subjects are particularly far reaching in their influence, immensely truthful and will always arouse a welcome enthusiasm in their reception by the public.

In the fire scene for the great production, "The Feud," to be issued in the near future by the Vitagraph Company, so much realism was given by the burning of a barn purchased for the purpose that it brought hundreds of persons from far and near intent upon witnessing the burning or lending a hand in extinguishing the flames. Their services were not needed, however, for the Vitagraph's fire brigade was on hand with fire extinguishers. When the flames were at their height and the picture had been taken, they easily put out the fire amid cheers and shouts of the assembled crowd, who could hardly believe that it was not an accident instead of a feature in a moving picture play.

ESSANAY NOTES.

The Essanay Company have announced for early release a great dramatic picture, entitled "The Hand of Uncle Sam," a production of marvelous scenic effects and thrilling episodes. Slight defects in certain parts of the first negative made it necessary to delay the release of the picture until these portions of the picture could be remedied. It is worthy of note that the scenes of the picture have been obtained from various parts of the continent, the West, the Isthmus of Panama and in Mexico, while the indoor scenes were all made at the Chicago studio. A United States torpedo boat destroyer was put to the Essanay's disposal and is shown in the picture. Great care has been taken to present correct traditions in the way of costumes and settings, while the picture, on the whole, is both dramatically and photographically perfect. The story is founded on the recent American-Nicaraguan controversy and tells of a young American mining engineer, who has established himself in one of the Isthmian republics, is arrested and accused of conspiracy against the government. He is court-martialed and sentenced to be shot, but at the dramatic moment, when he is dragged into the prison yard, United States marines arrive and prevent the execution. In the meantime the real offender, the American's native clerk, is arrested and evidence clearing the American is found. The film is a feature and will be released March 23.

The Essanay's "The Fence on 'Bar Z' Ranch," a Western drama lately released, has been pronounced by many exhibitors and exchange men one of the most perfect and delightful Western subjects ever released by the Essanay Company. The photography, it is said, is simply wonderful. The story is something out of the ordinary and splendidly acted.

"The Essanay Guide," for the last two weeks in March, describes several more bully comedies, one a Western, and another full reel subject, "A Ranchman's Wooing," is an interesting and pleasing subject. "The Airship Gaze" is an oddity and a novelty and reads like another Essanay hit. It is prophetic of what may happen when the airship is as popular as the automobile. An actual and practical aeroplane, in flight, is shown in the film. "His Hunting Trip" is another full reel comedy subject, which appears to be something as substantial as "An Interrupted Honeymoon," released last week. Sportsmen who view this film should be interested as it includes a number of exciting chase scenes with dogs and rabbits, with all the funny incidents which occur to Nimrod's followers. The principal and important parts of the story, however, are with little wifey at home. The idea is original and interesting, and, produced with the liveliness which figures in all Essanay comedies, should prove a winner with the exhibitor and his audiences.

EDISON NOTES.

"Frankenstein," which will be released March 18, is a liberal adaptation of Mrs. Shelly's famous story under that title. As told in the film, the story shows Frankenstein, a young student of the sciences, leaving his father and sweetheart to pursue his studies at college. In the course of his researches he discovers the awful mystery of life and death and immediately determines to realize his one consuming ambition —to create the most perfect human being that the world has ever seen. The actually repulsive situations in the original version have been carefully eliminated in its visualized form, so that there is no possibility of its shocking any portion of an audience; but the dramatic strength of this gruesome story clings to its dramatization, and it is safe to say that no film has ever been released that can surpass it in power to fascinate an audience. The scene in the laboratory in which the monster seemed to gradually assume human semblance, is probably the most remarkable ever committed to a film. "Frankenstein" is a production that will hold an audience spellbound and is certain to excite a very great deal of attention and comment.

E. W. Townsend's latest contribution to Edison films will be released March 25. It is a dramatic subject entitled "The Suit Case Mystery."

Don Fulano, the world's greatest living educated horse, which recently won favor in "An Equine Hero," will make his next appearance at an early date in a film entitled "Bradford's Claim," in which it is said his work is even more remarkable than in the first subject.

Among the subjects slated by the Edison Company for an an early release are "Michael Strogoff," Jules Verne's great story of the exciting adventures of a faithful courier of the Czar, and "Her First Appearance," especially prepared by Richard Harding Davis.

"A Western Romance," released March 22, tells an absorbing story which has its foundation in the betrothal of a little boy and girl, brought about by their parents in order to conform to a clause in a will, by the provisions of which a fortune is left to the girl providing she marries the boy before her twenty-fifth birthday. The two families separate, the young girl growing up in the West, where she not only learns to forget the sweetheart of her childhood days, but also to cherish a resentment of the contemplated alliance as she grows older. Under an assumed name the young man, who has since fallen in love with the girl through the medium of a photograph which her mother has sent East, starts for the West, determined to overcome her objections and win her heart. This he succeeds in doing, after their successful escape from the plottings of a rival, who has brought to his assistance a band of Indians and desperadoes of the plains. The attempt of the hirelings of the rival suitor to waylay and murder the young fellow is thwarted by his sweetheart, who has overheard the plot and who effects his rescue in a daring and thrilling manner. The pictures were taken at a considerable expense in the West, and outside of the two principals the actors are natives of that section, real Indians and real cowboys being employed. A story that teems with realism, splendidly photographed and superbly acted.

PATHE NOTES.

Pathe Freres are outfitting the Nelson-Wolgast fight pictures. Five Pathe machines are to be used for these pictures on their tour through the country. They are to be seen first at the Casino Theater, Brooklyn; Columbia Theater, Boston; the Lyric Theater, Chicago, and the Star Theater, Milwaukee, where they will appear simultaneously. This order was placed through the Pathe representatives, Turner & Dahnken, in San Francisco, and the selection of the Pathe machine for these pictures was made after careful tests of various other makes. The "Pathe Professional" is considered by all who know it, as exceptionally fine for pictures of this sort, as the flicker which interferes so materially with the proper viewing of a rapid pugilistic encounter, is entirely eliminated. The pictures are to be shown only on Pathe machines, which will travel with the pictures wherever they go.

Pathe Freres will release, in the near future, a film of exceptional strength and merit—Shakespeare's "Othello." The story of the famous Moor of Venice will be released as a film d'art. The pictures were taken in the famous Queen of the Adriatic, and the beautiful Venetian buildings, the charm of the Grand Canal, and all the exquisite beauty of the famous palaces of Venice are all shown in the picture, in addition to the marvelous pantomimes executed by the leading actors of Italy. Many have seen "Othello," but never in such setting. The stage has been noted for wonders of scenic fidelity, but to enact this marvelous tragedy along the very waters and in the very gardens and palaces as the immortal Shakespeare pictured them with his versatile pen, is to add an interest which could not be obtained in any other way. We are shown Othello and Desdemona in the palace. We see Iago going to the palace of the Doge, along the Grand Canal, and we seem to be in the gondola with him as it sweeps steadily along, propelled by the muscular gondolier who so ably handles his oar. Imposing facades, beautiful colonnades, magnificent porticos and marvelously wrought gateways, all come under our view as we pass from one scene to another of this great play. The film is colored with the usual Pathe excellence, and it is well to note that the costuming and the interior decorations are absolutely correct to the period.

R. W. Teed, the Pathe travelling representative, after a most successful and gratifying month in Boston, during which time he demonstrated and sold a large number of the "Pathe Professionals," has made a victorious march through New Hampshire and Vermont, inspecting the various Pathe machines now in use and in many instances installing new ones. A demonstration of the Pathe projecting machine seems to be absolute proof of its great superiority, and Mr. Teed is experiencing no difficulty in placing them wherever a new machine is needed.

LUBIN NOTES.

It does not always happen that accidents in picture making improve the film. The other afternoon one of the Lubin directors was working on a comedy picture, soon to figure in the releases. In the middle of one of the scenes, in which a man was being dragged into a house, two huge dogs came bounding across the lawn from opposite sides and attacked the heels of the victim. Had they been rehearsed their entrance could not have been more opportune nor their comedy better and the result is an added comedy value to an already funny picture.

The Lubin automobile has proven such a convenience to the production department that the charter of a power boat is contemplated for the Summer season. The shores of the Delaware are most picturesque and it is planned to make these trips a relaxation for the players during the hot spell, while the stories planned will be the better for their handsome settings.

The other day the scenario department received a letter accompanying a picture suggestion which ran in part, "Please telegraph me when you get this how much you will pay me for it. Send it collect, the enclosed is to pay you for the trouble." The enclosure was a five-cent stamp, which was returned with the story. In the past week the scenario department received eighteen St. Patrick Day stories, but meanwhile the printing and joining rooms had the "Irish Boy" in plenty of time to make the extra prints called for by alert exhibitors who appreciated the value of the first run of this film on St. Patrick's Day.

IMP NOTES.

As a rule Mr. Storey, of the New York Board of Film Censors, is a very quiet, august individual and, outside of the morality comb he wields, he's a pretty reliable barometer for picture plays—or rather, his face is. Besides his official capacity, he is a profound student of moving pictures, in both execution and effect. He was at the Imp headquarters the other day (official call), and he saw "The Stage Note," which will be released Thursday, March 24. The first part of this farce represents a rehearsal of a drama by some amateurs. The ordinary observer would immediately recognize the work as a clever burlesque on amateur acting, and Mr. Storey laughed loud and long. When the picture was finished another of the spectators remarked that it was a pretty good "take-off." "Take-off, nothing!" said Mr. Storey. "I have seen amateurs rehearse, and I tell you that that scene is true to life!" One is moved to remark that if that is his experience, it is no wonder he is such an ardent advocate of "the uplift of the drama."

As usual, there were numerous visitors at the office, on Fourteenth street, on Monday, to express their opinion of the day's release. It was "Mother Love" last Monday and the compliments were many. One visitor was a picturesque old gentleman, and it was his fourth call. He had something to say: "Do you know, since the Imp came to Mr. Rosenquest's house I have gotten the habit, as they say, and I have fallen in love with them. And," he added, "I have become a regular Imp 'first runner.'" That's going the "first nighter" one better!

NESTOR FILM NOTES.

The Nestor Stock Company, that has been operating in the vicinity of New York, leaves for the West this week to make a series of cowboy and mining pictures, and great care is to be exercised in the selecting of picturesque backgrounds. Those who are best familiar with the country to be visited declare it to be the best in the United States for the purpose.

Nebraska Bill's cowboys will be seen in Nestor films exclusively, and negotiations are in progress with an Indian troupe, said to be the best in the show business, to appear in Nestor films, in a series of Indian pictures in preparation by a writer on Indian subjects of national reputation.

The demand for the cowboy subjects of the Nestor make has become so great that it has been decided to release one of these every week until further notice. The dramas and comedies that are on hand and in preparation will be put out as a separate release to be announced as soon as a constant supply can be guaranteed to the trade.

With the opening of the office of Mr. A. G. Whyte, in Chicago, a step in advance was made by the Independent interests. In the few weeks that he has been in the West, Mr. Whyte has brought "order out of chaos" and the exchanges are now in a position where they can depend on knowing exactly what film they will release on any given day.

NEW YORK MOTION PICTURE COMPANY'S NOTES.

Mr. Chas. Baumann, general manager of the New York Motion Picture Company, some months ago, realizing the values and possibilites of California as a natural studio for producing motion pictures, secured a large ranch in the southern part of the State, on which he has installed the famous Bison Stock Company. The ranch covers more than a thousand acres of land. There are orange and banana groves grape vineyards, and in fact almost any kind of a tropical scene can be found upon the ranch. Mt. Lowe, with its snow capped peaks, is within a short distance and affords an excellent spot for producing Winter scenes from one end of the year to the other. The ranch, which borders on the Pacific Ocean, has a fine beach front, a mile in length, where pictures depicting tales of the deep blue sea can be very readily produced. Of the one thousand acres there are about three hundred acres of prairie land, where a number of very fine subjects of "life on the plains" have been produced Among the buildings on the estate, of which there are quite a number, is an old colonial mansion in which the members of the Bison Stock Company live, enjoying the vast pleasures of this modern "Garden of Eden."

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CLERGY AND THE PICTURE.

February 23, 1910.

Editor, Moving Picture World:

Referring to the article in a recent issue of The World, by Lux Graphicus, in which he calls attention to the marked change in the attitude of the press and the pulpit toward the motion picture, would say that while in many of his statements he is correct, it occurs to me that his second paragraph is rather misleading. Anyone not thoroughly informed would naturally infer that the clergymen as a whole had until recently been up in arms against the motion picture. It cannot be denied that a few narrow-minded wearers of the cloth here and there were strenuous in their denunciation of the motion picture. It is also true that at times some very able ministers took exceptions to certain classes of pictures upon very excellent grounds too well known to need discussion here. This state of affairs, however, was not current by any means, for motion picture exhibitions were given in churches many years before motion picture theaters and exchanges were in existence.

During my experience of thirteen years before church audiences, I have never heard any serious objection voiced by the pastor of any church where it has been my privilege to exhibit, and I can name fifty right here in Philadelphia. It is not necessary to put on religious, strictly educational or other "tame" subjects in order to cater to ministers or church people, for they demand as much entertainment along this line as anyone else. The youngsters demand "cowboys and Indians" and the grown-ups want "something to laugh at," and all that is necessary is to use a little judgment in selecting subjects. Perhaps if the managers had paid a little more attention to the class of pictures they were exhibiting there would have been no kick even from the narrow-minded.

I remember to have read an article in The World which asserted that the churches of Philadelphia were actually in opposition to the motion picture theater, because at that time there were so many exhibitions being given. Many churches have their own machines and conduct their own picture entertainments. There are scores of large Catholic churches in New York and some in Boston where I have exhibited whose pastors are warm admirers of good pictures, and the same may be said of Brooklyn, Jersey City, Albany, Chester Wilmington, Baltimore, Washington and dozens of cities and towns visited by me.

Most emphatically, therefore, I would say that the pulpit as a whole has not been unjustly censorious.

Not so much can be said of the newspapers. One instance is still fresh in my mind. It was during the "frenzied legislation" that the editor of a certain resort paper and myself undertook to pave the way for increased business along the Jersey coast from Atlantic to Cape May by running a motion picture section each week. I contradicted erroneous statements appearing in the press of Philadelphia and based observations upon condition of the business here. A copy of the paper reached The Moving Picture World and evidently was of interest, for it printed a whole column from my section verbatim. We were soliciting advertisements and getting them slowly but surely each week, when the owner of the paper ordered the section out, preferring to fill up with "boiler plate." On the other hand, during the seven consecutive Summers of my connection with Cloward's Motion Picture Theater, at Brandywine Springs Park, the press of Wilmington was especially friendly. "The Life of the American Fireman" got us half a column of favorable comment, and "Uncle Tom's Cabin," put on with quartette and lecture, received another. That was the first motion picture house to open in the State of Delaware, and the admission was ten cents until Cloward sold it last Summer. I cannot remember the number of times we have entertained the children from the orphanages accompanied by fifteen or twenty reverend sisters whose outing was sanctioned by no less an authority than the Rt. Rev. Bishop Monagahan.

Yours very truly,

WILLIS ELLIOTT REYNOLDS.

[Clergymen as a whole are of course not antagonistic to the moving picture, but it cannot be denied that an appreciable minority made themelves, some time ago, painfully conspicuous by their perfervid denunciations of all moving pictures and all moving picture theaters and entertainments. It is this bigoted and sweeping generalization on the part of some clergymen to which The Moving Picture World will always object.—Ed. M. P. W.]

The Converts

A Story of the Strange Transformation of Two Souls

This Biograph production illustrates the powerful influence of the Word of God, no matter by what lips it is uttered. In a Western town there lives a party of young fellows, who have little to do with their time. Novel, indeed, are the many schemes in which they indulge to dissipate the ennui they are victims of, but the latest, while seemingly blasphemous, was fruitful of good results. One of them conceives the idea of posing as an evangelist, and during the masquerade converts one of the women of the dance hall, who believes him sincere. She becomes a settlement house worker, devoting her energies to charity and prayer. Later she meets the young man and larns of his baseness. He is conscience-stricken and in time is converted himself. The story is indeed a most powerful sermon.

The Love of Lady Irma

An Impetuous Woman's Extreme Measure to Hold Her Husband's Love

Here is shown the extreme to which a woman's devotion may lead her. The Lady Irma is the devoted wife of a very handsome man, who because of his appearance and affable nature is a favorite with all the women. Although sure her husband loves her deeply, she is fearful of their excessive adulation turning his head. If he were not so handsome she would feel easy. As this thought occurs to her a subtle but fearful plan impresses her. On the spur of the moment she engages the services of two thugs to disfigure his face. This done, she is filled with remorse, and more unhappy than ever. Later she finds she must confess, and while the husband is at first amazed, he recognizes her impulsiveness of intent and forgives her; he happy in her love alone.

THE CONVERTS.—We see here a young man living a life of self indulgence and idleness, and we know that the idle shall be food for evil, and in this case even to the mockery of God's word. Bored, he seeks something novel, and his reckless companions suggest he masquerade as an evangelist and preach outside the dance hall of this Western town. This appeals to him as a most unique diversion, so off they go, he dressed as a minister, to start their little gospel meeting. Arriving outside the hall, he begins his discourse. Inside we find those poor creatures who walk in the Darkness, but we must forgive them, for they know not what they do. The young fellow, being of an emotional nature, and an eloquent speaker, the Word rings truth, though uttered by false lips. So impressive is it that one of the poor wretches of the place is irresistibly drawn to his side while her very soul drinks in the Word which seems to soothe. The young man regards this a huge joke, though he dissembles before the girl. The girl leaves the hall and goes to her room, where, weeping, she kneels and prays. Her soul breathes forth that penitential plea: "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me." As the words fall from her lips there comes a feeling of peace she has never before experienced. Thereupon she resolves to give her life in repentance. Leaving her room, she cries: "Unto the fallen will I carry the Word that restored me. I will teach the unjust thy ways: and the wicked shall be converted unto thee." She now becomes a settlement house worker, and one day during her mission work she comes face to face with the young profligate, now intoxicated, whom she had thought a priest. At first she is shocked at the discovery of this man's baseness, and turns away from him. "Still," she reasons, "was it not through him I saw the Light and heard the Word?" Her plain duty is to save him, but the bitter hurt of a guilty conscience causes him to slink from the spot. Rushing to his home he now fully realizes what a contemptible dog he has been, for in the girl he saw what good a man can do, and yet how he will fall all through his own choice. His heart aches with the misery of his own degradation, and his hope for peace seems vain. Finally, he rushes out, determined to find the girl and throw himself at her feet for forgiveness, but he is shown a better way, for meeting her as she is assisting a poor old man who had fallen on the road, their souls meet in one resolve.

THE LOVE OF LADY IRMA.—Lady Irma is the wife of a handsome man who is the object of admiration of all the women, and wherever he appears they flock about him to such an extent that the wife, though assuming that she is not jealous, is afraid that their excessive adulation may turn his head and she will be forgotten. She asks herself if she can hold his love. She, with candor, realizes that she is not more beautiful than most of them, and maybe not as attractive as some. Here she is tortured by fears, although he is devoted to her. Protestations on his part serve but little to ease her mind when she sees him in the midst of a throng of admiring women, and her perturbation is ill concealed. To her best friend she is about to write her fears, and ask advice, when an idea occurs to her. If he was not so handsome they would possibly not so thoroughly monopolize his attentions. If he could only meet with some disfiguring accident—at this point of her soliloquy a horrible plan presents itself to her mind and she impetuously puts it into effect, engaging the services of a couple of thugs to waylay her husband and sear his face in a manner to disfigure his beauty. For this she pays them a considerable sum. The deed is perpetrated and the affair is enveloped in mystery, as there appeared to be no plain reason for the assault. However, the wounds heal, but he is brutally disfigured for life. It is now that Lady Irma feels the awful weight of remorse, which is not even lightened by the contemptuous attitude of the women at his appearance. This is not the worst torment, for the thugs, appreciating the hold they have on her, use a threat to expose her as a means to extort more money. During one of their visits they are surprised by the husband, who throws them bodily out of the house. Reasoning that he will sooner or later learn the truth, she confesses. He is at first amazed, but upon learning what had induced her step, he forgives her.

FRUIT GROWING, GRAND VALLEY, COLORADO.—This film shows the wonderful results accompanied by irrigation, of which we of the East know practically nothing. The whole growth of the orchard is shown, even the arid lands before the irrigation process has begun. The great wheel, by which the water is lifted above its level and division boxes filled and distributed to the various irrigating ducts, the operation of spraying by which injurious insects are destroyed, and, perhaps most interesting of all, the way the fruit is protected against frost, are all graphically shown and through the medium of excellent photography. The sight of the many fires burning in the orchard, by means of which the temperature is raised from 12 to 15 degrees, is most picturesque and not to be forgotten.

The operator made a special trip to Grand Valley, Colorado, for the purpose of getting this picture, and through the courtesy of the fruit company was enabled to achieve a most satisfactory result.

A MOUNTAIN BLIZZARD.—Three tenderfeet are on a prospecting tour in the Sierra Nevada Mountains. They meet with several adventures, trying to them but intensely amusing to the spectator. After having purchased a necessary third horse they meet with an Indian, who warns them of an approaching snowstorm. Disregarding the warning, they proceed and are caught in a mountain blizzard. They lose their way, and in trying to recover the trail circle about for hours. Night overtakes them in a pitiable condition. They make several efforts to get a fire after having exhausted their store of matches. They resort to rubbing twigs and even try to light a fire by discharging a pistol at the inflammable twigs. They merely succeed in scattering the twigs as well as all hope of artificial heat. In their despair they conclude to lie down and die. Bidding each other a pathetic farewell and asking mutual forgiveness, they renounce their favorite vices—cards, tobacco and whiskey—and settle down in the drifting snow. The next morning they are awakened by the attendants of a mountain hotel which stood within a few feet of the spot where they slept, but was obscured from view by the storm. After a warm breakfast, each man returns to his worldly ways. The humor of this situation is shown in the final tableau of the picture.

ESSANAY FILM MFG. CO.

AN INTERRUPTED HONEYMOON.—The film starts where many just leave off. The minister at the wedding of Jack and Jennie is just pronouncing the solemn words, "I pronounce you man and wife."

The scene changes to the doorway of a university. A Freshman is undergoing the initial step of entering college—hazing. We see him dart out of the door, followed by a dozen college boys.

They are near the railway station and the Freshman darts into the station and out on the platform. It is then that we note the strong resemblance of the two fellows.

The train has pulled up and Jennie is anxiously waiting, when the Freshman backs into her. She seizes him by the wrist and drags him aboard the train. The flabbergasted youth does not know nor care where the woman is dragging him, he only hopes to escape the clutches of the rowdy Sophs.

The train pulls out and Jennie discovers her mistake when they are seated in the Pullman. "You are not my husband," she says, looking at him aghast.

And Jack, who has returned just in time to see the tail end of the train disappearing around a curve, looks around for his wife. Then the dozen Sophomores grab him and hustle him away, believing him to be the Freshman.

They give him a rough hazing before the discovery that he is the wrong man is made. They are all sympathy immediately and offer to do all in their power to get him out of the scrape.

After other complications Jack and Jennie locate each other and continue on their wedding trip and the elusive Freshman is hauled off by the college boys, who give him a double dose of the medicine he refused to take.

THE FENCE ON BAR Z RANCH.—Robert Graham, a rich land owner, buys a farm adjoining that of a widow, Mrs. Sarah Brown. In surveying the property, the report of the surveyors' makes the claim that the Widow Brown's fence, dividing the two properties, encroaches five feet on Graham's property.

Graham is a thorough business man, so he sends a note to the Widow Brown commanding that the fence be set back where it belongs.

The widow receives the note and says: "The fence will remain where it is."

The next day three workmen drive up to the Widow Brown's gate and tell her that they have received orders to set the fence back five feet. Mrs. Brown turns back into the house and emerges a moment later with a loaded shotgun and a threat that the first man who touches her fence will be shot. They retreat and are finally forced off the widow's premises.

The next day Graham, raging with indignation, comes on the scene. A sign is posted at the fence, which says, in effect, that the first man who touches her fence will be shot.

The widow's little girl is playing in the yard. Graham takes no notice of her and sets to work. A moment later the widow hears the sound of splitting wood and comes to the door with a shotgun. A moment later a shot is fired, there is a scream of a child, and the uninjured man, who has been fired upon, dashes across the yard and seizes the wounded baby.

The horror stricken widow drops the gun and runs out! She had shot at Graham and had wounded her baby girl.

Jumping on his horse with the girl in his arms Graham rides with all the speed he can obtain from the tirerd pony and an hour later draws up at the home of the local doctor. The baby, almost dead from loss of blood, is restored by the doctor and a few days later taken home.

But the disputed fence? Both Graham and the widow had forgotten it completely. Mrs. Brown, repentent and deeply grateful to Graham, acknowledges that she may have done wrong. Graham, however, has learned to love the little woman and—

The finish is a pretty one. The old, troublesome fence is removed entirely and the two properties, with the two hearts, made into one.

METHOD IN HIS MADNESS.—A doddering old gentleman, out for his morning's constitutional, suffers an attack of epilepsy in front of a saloon in the country town. Pedestrians run to his rescue and the barkeeper of the saloon brings out a good jolt of whiskey to revive the stricken one. A tramp who has noted the accident, has also mentally noted the glass of whiskey, and being thirsty for a drink himself, he turns away, a brilliant scheme revolving in his mind.

A few minutes later the tramp in passing another saloon is seen to fall and go into violent contortions. A crowd gathers and the saloonkeeper comes out with the dose of whiskey.

"Weary" is delighted, and meeting an old tramp friend of his, puts him wise to the little game. They return to the first saloon and the second tramp has a fit. The unsuspecting bartender comes out with the usual glass of whiskey, and the tramp is revived. The bartender, however, sees into their scheme and watches them heading for the saloon further down the street.

"Weary" and his pal, under the influence of the first drinks, have grown reckless and resolve to work the trick on every saloon in the community.

They return to saloon number two, but the bartender of saloon number one has beat them there and put his competitor next to the tramps' scheme.

Both tramps go into violent fits and the saloonkeepers rush out. Each carries a seltzer bottle and it is not booze, but a cold spray of seltzer, that restores the two tramps to their senses.

THE INVENTOR'S MODEL.—Thomas Hunter, an aged inventor, who has been laboring many years on an automatic elevator for the quick and labor-saving manipulation of coal, is seen in his workshop just putting the finishing touches to his model. To his great delight he finds that the invention is a success and that at last he has realized his life's ambition. Smiling Fortune has come to him at last.

Hunter is enthusiastic about an early disposition of his patent and calls upon H. B. Clifford & Co., promoters of inventions. Clifford is a scoundrel, one of the many wily vampires who prey on the brains and labor of the absorbed man of genius. Hunter is not informed on the technicalities of copyright and patent protection, and after the shrewd eye of the promoter has mentally noted the great possibilities of Hunter's invention, he accepts a check from Clifford for "$10,000 on account" and is advised to leave the model with the promoter, who will endeavor to give it more careful consideration.

Some few days later Hunter receives a letter from Clifford stating that while the model has no great value as an invention, he will endeavor to place it.

An hour later two or three wealthy capitalists call to inspect the model and write Clifford a big check for the invention.

The days go by and Hunter receives no further word from the promoter. His frequent calls at the promoter's office always receive the same answer: "Mr. Clifford is not in."

In the meantime, Nell Winfield, Clifford's stenographer, has learned of her employer's stealing the elevator model. Clifford has made love to the girl and has promised to marry her, but his sudden change of fortune in the earnings of the elevator model has caused him to change his mind regarding his matrimonial inclinations toward Miss Winfield. This offers her the incentive of wreaking her revenge upon Clifford by informing Hunter, the inventor, that he has been mercilessly cheated by the promoter.

In a rage, the old inventor again goes to Clifford's office. But he is bodily ejected and threatened with arrest if he again enters the office. Hunter patiently waits and later follows Clifford into a cafe, where the latter is entertaining a number of lady friends. Hunter slips quietly upon Clifford and seizing him by the throat throws him to the floor. In the melee the table is upset and the diners thrown into a panic. The police are called and Hunter is arrested. He is taken to the police station, where he is formally accused of attempted murder by Clifford and Clifford's companion, but Miss Winfield's new fiancee, who, with his sweetheart, has heard of Hunter's arrest, calls at the station and gives bond for the release of the old man. Then Miss Winfield turns to Clifford and accuses him before the desk sergeant of having robbed the old gentleman of his invention.

The case is settled in court a few weeks later. Evidence is given and Clifford is clearly defeated. There is a pathetic scene of the old man and his aged wife on the witness stand. But Nell Winfield's story has won the case for them and the model and the accrued sums, wrongfully taken by Clifford, are restored to the old inventor.

PATHE FRERES.

A TRAGIC ADVENTURE.—It is the Winter season on the Riviera, and Baron Harington finds that an old friend of his, Lady Brookes, is staying with her husband at the villa. He calls upon her unannounced, first sending a note to her husband to lure him to keep a fictitious appointment at the club. Towards midnight the Baron, leaving the villa by climbing down from the balcony, is seen and apprehended by the police. Almost at the same moment a tragic scene is taking place within the villa. A thief has entered, and encountering Lady Brookes, kills her in his fear. Her cries are heard by the little group outside and by the returning husband. All rush in and find the body of the dead woman.

The Baron is overwhelmed by the tragedy and confesses to being the writer of the letter. Sir Brookes, half mad with fear and rage, fires his revolver at him, but the bullet falls wild, and although the discovery of the thief establishes the innocence of the Baron in the matter of the crime, he turns to leave with the weight of the crime and the knowledge of his own wrongdoing heavy upon him.

A SEASIDE FLIRTATION.—This is a bright little comedy, very amusing and not too long. In it are narrated the troubles and worries of a Mr. Hothed, the father of a pretty and fascinating daughter, who endeavors to beguile the tediousness of a seaside holiday, spent in his company, by a flirtation with a chance acquaintance, named Archie Tinkle. Herr father, however, strongly objects, deeming the young man in no way eligible for his daughter on account of his impecuniosity. The couple are therefore obliged to resort to various ruses to obtain a few minutes of liberty away from the sharp eyes of the old gentleman. On one occasion, in the door of his bathing machine as a precautionary measure the latter insists upon Molly clinging tight to a towel held fast to ensure her presence close at hand. Archie finds a way out of the difficulty thus created, by tying a camp stool to a towel. Furthermore, he bribes a small boy to purloin Mr. Hothed's clothes whilst that gentleman is bathing, and so secures altogether ten minutes uninterrupted conversation with Molly. Molly, however, finds the flirting under such circumstances much too strenuous, and dismisses her admirer. As a set-off to the joys she thus voluntarily sacrifices, she concocts a little plan for the mystification and subjugation of her father by pretending to be in loving conversation with a dummy figure, much to the old gentleman's exasperation.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

A BROTHER'S DEVOTION.—The older of two brothers living with their widowed mother in the South, leaves the old home to engage in business in New York City. While he is there his mother dies and he sends for his younger brother, who is a struggling young artist, to join him and together they can share his earnings and at the same time the younger can pursue his art study in the Metropolis. The artist accepts the generous offer of his brother.

The older brother is in love with a young girl and he introduces her to his brother. While the girl admires the older brother, she is attracted by the younger, between whom there is a common interest in things artistic. Noticing this, the older brother quietly withdraws in favor of the young artist and arranges to go to Panama, presumably on a business trip. Before going away he makes his brother swear that he will ever be true to the girl and never neglect her for another.

No sooner has the older brorther gone away than his brother is fascinated by an adventuress who comes to his studio to pose for her picture. Gradually she completely dominates him and he is found in her company at all times.

Unexpectedly, the older brother returns from Panama, broken in health and a mere shadow of his former self. He meets his old sweetheart and asks after his brrother. She tells him that she has not seen his brother in weeks. He goes in search of his brother, finds the studio deserted and learns that he is living with the adventuress.

Weak and ill, he calls at the woman's home. He denounces her as a a sorceress and a schemer. At this moment the young artist enters the room and seeing his generous brother's condition and realizing his ingratitude to him, humbly begs his pardon, and clasping him in his embrace, weeps in sorrow and shame. He rejects all advances made by his paramour with scorn, and with his brother leaves the place forever.

The brothers are now located in the old room where they lived when the young artist came to New York. After making the sick man comfortable, the young man goes out for a doctor. During his absence the sick brother sends a note to the father of the young girl whom he gave up in favor of the brother to come with his daughter at once that he might make a request before his death.

They come, and at the same time the brother returns with the doctor, who says that the sick man is dying. The older brother rekuests a reconciliation between his brother and the girl. His request granted, he passes away in peaceful consciousness of having made love's supreme sacrifice.

CONSCIENCE; OR THE BAKER BOY.—The love of a wife for another, the jealousy of the husband when he discovers his wife's duplicity and the killing of the lover by the infuriated husband, brings about the development of "Conscience." The husband lying in wait for his wife's lover stabs him to death. While he and his associate are throwing the body into the canal, the murderer unknowingly drops his dagger, which is picked up by a little baker boy who is making an early morning delivery.

Pleased with his find and the elegancy of its design, he hides it inside his shirt and hurries home to show it to his people. While they are admiring it, there s a disturbance out in the street and they all hurry outside to see what it is all about. They learn that the excitement is caused by the finding of the body of the lover in the canal.

The baker boy, who still has the dagger in his hand, is asked by the police where he got it and if he knows anything about the murder. He explains the matter, but not to the satisfaction of the officers. He is arrested and under torture is forced to make a confession of his guilt, is tried before the Tribunal of Judges, one of whom is the assassin, and the Doge sentences the boy to execution.

The murderer, who is now seen among the Judges, when he hears the death sentence of the boy, is conscience stricken and confesses his guilt. The baker boy has been led to the scaffold, and as the executioner is raising the ax over his head, an officer excitedly makes his appearance with a pardon and the boy is saved.

TAMING A GRANDFATHER.—John Channing, a wealthy retired old fellow, who has humored himself in all his whims, is estranged from his widowed daughter because she had married a man distateful to him; he will have nothing to do with her and her child, Peggy, a bright and attractive girl, in whom the mother's interest is entirely centered.

Being left in cramped circumstances, the daughter writes to her father for assistance without avail. A young physician of the neighborhood, attending both the mother, who is more or less of an invalid, and the grandfather, who is afflicted with gout, calls to see Peggy's mother just as she receives the old man's note of denial. The doctor loves Peggy and comes to the rescue.

He recommends Peggy to her grandfather as a trained nurse, with instructions that the old gentleman must accept her services and treatment implicitly, or he will refuse to attend him further. Peggy, whom the grandfather has never seen, is introduced by the doctor, and at once begins to take charge of the irritable and obstinate old patient.

She proves herself master of the situation, and through her skillful and tactful handling of her grandfather he becomes tractable and amiable, as well as entirely cured of his ailments, and very much attached to his pretty young nurse. When she makes herself known as his granddaughter, at first he is ashamed of himself for his conduct toward her and her mother; then he kisses her just as the young doctor enters with Peggy's mother, whom the old gentleman takes in his arms and fondly embraces, while Peggy and the doctor are pleased with the results of their happy scheme and themselves.

KALEM FILMS

THE SEMINOLE'S TRUST

Issue of March 16 Length 960 feet

Here is a great Indian picture of a different sort—the story of a faithful Seminole. But of all the thrillers we have turned out since we started specializing on Indian subjects, this is the limit. We doubt if anything more stirring than the pursuit of the Cuban desperado through the Florida everglades—with its terrifically tragic ending—has ever been done in motion pictures. The title of this scene, "The Haunting of Fear," will give you some idea of its intensity.

EVERYWHERE, Moving Picture houses are being packed by KALEM INDIAN PICTURES. You need them. You should insist on having them.

THE ENCHANTED CASTLE

Issue of March 18 Length 955 feet

A very prominent newspaper critic, on seeing "THE ENCHANTED CASTLE" run in our studio, remarked: "Why that is the 'CHANTECLER' of moving pictures. It will make all kinds of a hit." And so it will. All the leading characters represent animals, the Bear, the Frog, the Rabbit, the Cat, the Dog, the Monkey, etc.

"The Enchanted Castle" is a wonderful Romantic Comedy-Drama with many a laugh and many a thrill, and above all a novelty which will interest and amuse young and old alike. Don't overlook it. It is the big feature of the Spring!

LUBIN FILMS

THIS IS ONE YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO MISS

RELEASED THURSDAY, MARCH 17

"The Irish Boy"

A splendidly told story of a young Emigrant who finds fortune through hard work and wins a home for the girl he loves and the dear old folks from over the seas. No cheap appeal to false sentiment but a heart interest story that mingles tears and laughter. In acting, settings and photographic excellence this subject is notably good. A business bringer for St. Patrick's Day and afterwards. APPROXIMATE LENGTH, 930 FEET.

A DOUBLE COMEDY BILL

RELEASED MONDAY, MARCH 14

"Mamma's Angel Child"

Children stories always interest. Here one of the Lubin Juvenile stars is shown cutting some new capers that are laughable and out of the ordinary. Just a succession of laughs with a thread of story and a novelty climax. APPROXIMATE LENGTH, 505 FEET.

"The Blunderer"

Another comedy subject and fully as funny. The Blunderer is a country lad who is sent to the city Uncle to acquire polish. The period of his education is brief but very eventful and presently we see him back on the farm contentedly playing with the small pig that is his pet.

APPROXIMATE LENGTH, 455 FEET.

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the was installed.

He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely

Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A PLEASANT WALK.—An old gentleman starts out for his afternoon stroll, and while passing along the river front a high gust of wind carries off his hat. In order to avoid the curiosity of passersby, he purchases a cap from a porter whom he chances to meet. This new headgear leads everybody to believe he is a porter, and he is pestered with requests from everyone he meets. The climax is reached when two nervous young ladies ask him to scort them home. One the way he encounters his better half, who suspects him of gallantry, and when reaching home takes vigorous measures to convince him of her displeasure.

THE MAD DRAIN PIPE.—This picture illustrates the unfortunate dilemma of two policemen who, in pursuit of a couple of burglars, follow the latter on all fours into a large drainpipe. The thieves, emerging at the other end, quickly set the pipe in motion down hill. It spreads destruction on every hand, but at last crashes into a cafe into which the two thieves have gone, and are gloating over the success of their stratagem, whereupon the officers emerging, at last effect a capture.

WEDDING DURING THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.—During the French Revolution, the Lady of Trionville, Alaine, was left sole mistress of the castle; she marries Marquis Erneste de Tressailles, who has taken leave from the Royalist army for a few days. When the latter arrives at the castle with some of his brother officers, the republican servant Prosper, in a fit of temper, pulls the royalistic cockade from the hat of the new master. A few moments after, the soldiers of the revolutionary army having advanced, take possession of the castle, and the young Marquis has to flee. The servant is so touched by this untimely interruption, that out of pity for the Marquis, he takes the royalistic cockade and tries to hide it, but it is found, and he is considered a royalist and sentenced to die. The Marquis' flight is very short, as he is overtaken and made a prisoner. He is not even allowed to see his wife, who had been married to him only a few hours previously. Alaine, his young wife, is greatly distressed that her husband should have to die, and she sends for the Colonel Marc-Arron, who was a great admirer of hers. She asks him to let her husband escape, but Marc-Arron sees only his duty, and her pleadings are of no avail. As she sees that money will not induce the colonel to help her she takes his hands and reminds him of their old friendship, when he was still an officer in the royal army. Marc-Arron, who still admires her, cannot resist her and promises her he will do his best. He qcickly exchanges his coat for that of the Marquis, and the latter escapes without taking any notice of his wife, leaving her in the hands of the revolutionists. Marc-Arron is now condemned to die, and when Alaine sees that he has really sacrificed his life for her, she sees how deep his love was for her, and she cannot but admire the man. Next morning when the time arrives for carrying out the sentence, Marc-Arron is very restless and afraid to face death, but when the sergeant reminds him that he must bear it like a man, he soon recovers, and proudly faces the soldiers. Alaine, who has now found out that she really loves him, begs him to escape, but he refuses to do so. In the meantime the Marquis has been taken prisoner again, at the moment when he tried to cross the frontier, and he is brought back to Trionville. Monteloup demands now that the Marquis should be shot instead of Marc-Arron, as the latter's life is of more value to the Republic, but Marc-Arron, thinking of his honor, does not wait for any decision, and calling out to the soldiers to fire, he dies, a hero and brave soldier.

HER COWBOY LOVER.—Jim Carson is foreman of the "Lone Star" Ranch, and he loves and is loved by Kate, the only daughter of old man Granger, the owner of the ranch. Our first scene shows the cowboys outside of their bunk house. It is pay day and Slim Harvey and Jack Ross, two bad men, are gambling. Jack accuses Slim of cheating, and the two men have a fist fight. Jim Carson comes into action at this point. He discharges both men and orders them off the ranch. Jack swears he will get even with Carson, and follows him to the ranch house. Kate gives Jim a letter from his old pal, Sam Lewis, in which Sam tells Jim that if he will invest a thousand dollars and his services in a gold mine he will make a millionaire of Jim. Kate asks Jim if he is going. For answer he throws the letter down, and taking her in his arms he kisses her. Old Man Granger hobbles in on one foot, the other one, gouty, wrapped up in flannel. Granger gives Jim a letter to Dale, a real estate agent in town, with $2,700 to pay off a mortgage. Jack Ross looks through the window and sees Jim place the wallet containing the money in his coat on the table. The old man gets a sudden attack of pain in his gouty foot, and Jim and Kate help him to his couch in the next room. Jack Ross sneaks in, takes the money and replaces the wallet in Jim's coat pocket. Jim bids Kate good bye and goes away on his mission, believing that the money is in his wallet. Jack takes to the woods and is counting the stolen money when Slim Harvey comes up, and the two have a terrific fight. They roll to the edge of the cliff, each struggling to keep the other from pushing him over. Here follows a scene that will thrill the spectator. Harvey rolls over the edge of the rock, but he holds on to Jack's hands. Jack pulls with might and main to save himself, but at last goes over the edge of the precipice. Harvey is killed, but Jack's body has fallen upon a projecting ledge of rock, and there he hangs, senseless, but alive. Jim reaches town, and discovering his loss at the real estate agent's office, he telegraphs to the ranch: "Have been robbed. Will be home noon to-morrow." Then we see Jim riding at breakneck speed for the ranch, his mind full of horror of the suspicion that will fall upon him when he fails to give any explanation of his loss. Arriving at the ranch, Jim is confronted by the furious father of his sweetheart and the sheriff. Jim protests his innocence, but when old man Granger shows the letter from Jim's pal offering him a share in a gold mine for $1,000, the sheriff arrests Jim. Kate clings to her lover Jim and proclaims her faith in his honesty. The angry father tears the girl from her lover's arms and Jim is taken away by the sheriff. Meanwhile, the body of Jack, the real culprit, is found by a hunter, and a thrilling rescue is made by a cowboy, who descends the side of the precipice and brings Jack, still alive, to safety. The dying man is taken to the ranch-house, where he confesses his crime, gives up the stolen money, and then dies. Kate jumps upon a horse and gallops away to tell her lover that his innocence has been proven. Another thrilling ride brings the girl up to the sheriff and Jim. The old man begs Jim's pardon and makes full amends by agreeing to accept him as his son-in-law.

WAR-TIME PALS.—Frank Brown and Al Smith, two young men, answer President Lincoln's call for volunteers, and they enlist for the war. Brown is seen bidding farewell to his sweetheart and marching off with his chum Smith.

Our next scene shows the two friends patrolling an output of the Union Army. The Confederates make an attack. Smith is wounded. Brown is seen rescuing Smith and is shot, but he gets Smith to the surgeon in time to save his life.

Twelve years pass and Brown is facing a more terrible situation. His dear wife dies in his arms and leaves him with their little son to mourn her loss. Then Brown is up against it. He has lost his job, he is penniless. His child cries: "Papa! I am hungry!" Brown wraps his coat about the shivering child, and he goes out determined to get food at any sacrifice. He is seen on the street, where, after a struggle with pride, he begs from passersby. But he looks like a bum and his pleadings for help are met with stony refusals. He passes a bank just as a prosperous looking old citizen comes out with a handful of money, some of which he counts out and gives to the man accompanying him. The sight of the money maddens the poor fellow. The temptation overcomes all his ideas of right, and he snatches the money and runs off followed by the owner. Brown gets away, and buys food for his starving child. The man whom he robbed meets a policeman, who proves to be Smith. The man explains and the two go on a hunt for Brown.

Our next scene shows Brown giving food to his little son. He believes himself safe, but a boy who has seen him run into the wretched tenement in which he lives has told the policeman and the man who was robbed. Brown hears their footsteps on the stairs. He hides the money. The man and policeman enter, and Brown begs the rich man to let him go, at the same time returning the money. The man counts it and demands the missing dollar. Smith, the policeman, touched by the distress of Brown (whom he has not recognized) and the child who begs them not to take his papa away, gives the man, from his own pocket, the amount missing. When the hard-hearted old fellow still demands the arrest of the poor father, Smith threatens to fan him with his club if the fellow doesn't "beat it." Brown now rises to thank the kind hearted policeman. They face and recognize each other. "My old pal!" and the two comrades are reunited.

The last scene shows Brown and his boy in Smith's home, which is now theirs. Smith enters with a letter for Brown, which informs him that he has been appointed to a good position in the police department. The little fellow grabs a flag and the two old soldiers stand in silent salute.

THE TIME-LOCK SAFE.—A mother arranges to go to a matinee with a friend; and the plan is that she is to leave her little daughter at her husband's office. She takes the little one down, but her husband is not in. With a feeling of safety (why not?) she entrusts the child to the care of the office boy, who promises to turn the child over to the father as soon as the latter returns.

The boy plays with the child, and we incidentally witness the routine of the office, one feature of which is the appearance of the man who changes the supply of towels at the employees' washstand. Soon after this the boy is sent out on an errand, and he is gone a long time. Before his return the mother and her friend return from the theater, and vry soon thereafter the father comes in from his business errand.

He greets his wife affectionately, and she asks him about their little girl. He pleads ignorance and she thinks he is joshing; but soon both realize that something is amiss, and they begin to search the office. They fail to find the child, when the father thanks of the safe. The clerks are preparing to leave, and the safe is locked it is a time-lock safe, that cannot be opened until the morning! He finds the little girl's hat near it! The parents are frantic, horror-stricken! A policeman is summoned, but he can do nothing. Finally he gets an idea.

He takes the father to the abode of a famous burglar, and the cracksman is entreated and paid an enormous sum to come to the office and exercise his art for the sake of the parents. He goes, but insists on being alone in the private office while he does the job. The parents and policeman step outside. He sits down to sharpen a tool, when he sees something. Those waiting outside are horrified to hear thunderous laughter from the burglar inside; in a little while he steps out and they all rush in anxiously, while the burglar exits.

There, in the little basket that the towel man left, lies the child, fast asleep, covered by two towels!

THE BROKEN OATH.—A young Neapolitan, full of the romance and adventuresome blood of his native heath, joins a secret society, and we witness his initiation. Later the leading lights of the organization undertake to blackmail a merchant, but they fail and resolve to bring about his demise. The band returns to headquarters, and the drawing of balls from a black bag decides who shall commit the deed. They all pull forth black balls until the young man's turn comes, and his fingers are holding a white ball! It is the fateful one, he is the chosen assassin, and the members of the band withdraw from the room.

He hastens to the home of his sweetheart and tells her what has occurred he must keep his pledge by turning murderer. She pleads, entreats, and her parents join her, and they finally induce him to break his oath. He promises them that he will. But this scene has been witnessed by two members of the society, and they take the news back to their chief. From that moment on the society plots to put him out of the way.

In their first effort they entice him away on the pretext of treating him, and get him into a deserted house. As soon as he is in he realizes his peril but too late. He is bound and suspended before a clock-like contrivance that is rigged with a pistol, and he must gaze at the hands go round to the fateful hour, eight, when the pistol, aimed at him, will shoot. Luckily, his sweetheart learns of the trick, and following various clues, reaches the house—and none too soon; for as she pushes the clock over, the pistol explodes. She was just in time.

By this time the plotters are more anxious to be rid of him, and they try again. They pounce on him as he walks on the street, and throw him into a closed carriage. They take him to a hut, and all preparations are made to blow it up with him. A small boy who knows him has seen this, however, and has ridden with them, concealed on the rear axle of the vehicle. He runs back home, tells the girl of it, and after a daring and perilous adventure she manages again to rescue her lover, the house being blown to bits together with the chief of the band.

HIS SICK FRIEND.—A young husband gets a note from some of his friends saying that a little game of poker is on, and his presence will add joy to the occasion. He springs the story of the poor sick friend on his wife, and gets away in good order, telephoning down that a seat at the seance be reserved for him. It is. But he forgot the note on the table when he used the 'phone, and his little wife discovers the missive. So! Now, what? She'll fix him. The first stage of the fixing process consists in telling her best friend all about it, and the friend advises her. She loans her a man's hat and coat, which the wife places on a chair by her dining-room table, and then proceeds to make the table look as if she and a good friend had been having a fine old time in the house while hubby is gone. She strews wine bottles around, upset, lights a few cigarettes to make butts, and tumbles things around in great shape. Her husband has been playing pretty long, and decides to go home, taking with him one of his companions at the game, who is unable to make his way alone too many highballs. When they come into the house the husband begins to look for his wife, while the friend crawls under the table. She comes on the scene defiant, but the storm of accusation that greets her is too much, and she turns timid. He points to the cigarettes, the wine, the hat, the coat, and then, to her surprise, lifts the table cover and reveals his chum, whom she does not know. It is now up to her to clear herself, and she tells him how she fixed that table up on purpose. Sure he forgives her for the presence of the man!

THE LOVER'S EMBARRASSMENT.—Lucas and Lucy have fallen deeply in love with each other, but "true love seldom runs smoothly," and owing to the fact that the parents of the young people strenuously object, the lovers are obliged to meet in secret.

It happens that the village in which our two young friends live has recently been thrown into a state of great excitement owing to considerable loss experienced by a great number of the villagers through the nightly pillaging of the poultry yards.

One day the parents of sweet Lucy are obliged to make a long journey to a neighboring town, and the young people think it an excellent opportunity to enjoy a few quiet, undisturbed hours together. While our two affectionate friends are happily engaged in love-making the plunderers arrive. Lucas and Lucy are too much engrossed to know of the danger which approaches the poultry of Lucy's thrifty father, and the thieves make a clean sweep. Still Lucas lingers on—perfectly oblivious to time—and papa and mamma arrive, and immediately the awful theft is discovered. "Lucy, Lucy," is called several times, and the frightened young lady, hearing her parents' voices bids her lover flee. It is too late, however, and he is captured while leaving the premises. He is greatly disconcerted; he cannot think of any way to explain his presence, as he could not think of jeopardizing the young lady in any way. A way is opened before him—he is accused of the poultry robbery, and for the sake of his dear Lucy, admits the theft. In the meantime, the real criminals have been captured by two constables as they were leaving the village and at that moment are brought up. Lucas' innocence is quickly proven, and all is mystery as to why he should so readily have acknowledged a crime which he had not committed. However, Lucy's mother, who is gifted with a very quick intuition, soon perceived the actual state of affairs and, remembering that she herself was once a girl, takes our young friends by the hands and consents to their union.

HONESTY, ITS OWN REWARD.—Near the entrance to a large and fashionable church we see a ragged, deplorable looking old man loitering, drawn thither, it seems, by the strains of beautiful, all-inspiring music that issue from that sacred edifice. The old man seems wrapped in contemplation and the expression on his withered old face tells us that he is calling to mind the time when he enjoyed the privileges of that happy communion now worshipping; it brings up vividly before him the contrast between himself and them, and he sighs wearily as he thinks of the long train of misadventures and struggles and grief that have led him to his present condition. At last, apparently, the music stops—the service is over, and the congregation begins to pour out of church. While descending the steps one of the ladies drops her purse, and as it strikes the ground two dollar-pieces roll out. Presently the old beggar's eye rests upon the purse and he hastily picks it up, but being near-sighted through age, does not notice the two coins which have fallen out of the purse. The poor old man, hungry and cold, and full of many sorrows, is seized with a great temptation; he thinks with glistening eyes of the comforts he could purchase for himself with his treasure—he reckons how many nights he may sleep in a warm bed instead of in the streets. Ah! it will be so good—it all looks so dear to him. But, no! In all his misery he has never stooped to dishonesty—he will not sully his old age by such a discreditable act. He therefore makes his weary way to the police station to deliver up his find. However, the owner of the purse has preceded him, in the hope of regaining her belongings. When she is handed her purse she immediately misses the two coins we saw fall upon the street, and the old beggar, about to depart, is brought back and accused of the theft. Although the old fellow positively denies his guilt, his appearance is against him and he is about to be placed under arrest. Just then two nuns appear and hand in two dollar-pieces, with the statement that the same were found on the steps of the church nearby. The old man then is released and goes his way, almost exhausted from want of food, etc. He is soon overtaken by the good nuns, who having noticed the poor man's condition, follow him, and offer assistance. They kindly direct him to a House of Refuge, and we leave our poor friend enjoying his new comforts—the reward of his own honesty!

THE TWO BROTHERS.—An old farmer possesses two sons. He introduces into his household a pretty domestic with the inevitable result that the elder son falls desperately in love with her, much to his father's disgust. Thereupon the old man disinherits him, turns him out of house and home, and bestows his fortune on his second son. The father's hasty temper brings about his own punishment. The poor old man becomes blind and dependant on the son to whom he left his fortune; by him he is buffeted about, denied almost the very means of subsistence and made the laughing stock of the farm hands, who tease and tantalize him. The son returning after the old mans temper has been sorely tried, the father attempts to strike him; the ungrateful son gives him his hat and stick and turns him adrift in the streets, telling him he shall beg his bread from door to door. It is here that the actor who took the part of the blind man is seen to advantage. The manner in which he staggers across the roads, narrowly escaping the traffic and thence on to the railway line, which he just succeeds in clearing as the express dashes by, proves him to be an actor of no mean ability and rivets the attention of those who witness the portrayal. Down a country lane the poor old man goes, when he stumbles and loses his stick. Without his only friend he gropes his way along and falls exhausted by the roadside. But helps is near at hand. The little daughter of his disinherited son is on her way to school, and finding the old man, assists him to her home. She persuades her father to let her bring the old man in and recognition follows, and we see the son touched by the pitiable sight of his father, forgiving him for the wrong done to him and the old man comfortably becomes one of the family.

LIFE IN THE NEXT CENTURY.—According to the most amusing film, our descendants are to have an extremely lively time in the year 2001 A.D. When they awake upon St. Valentine's day, that is, if it has not gone out of date, they will have simply to press a button and, in the kitchen the bread will walk to the fire, return all nice and crisp to the butter-dish, there to gaily bespread itself and then to escort the tea to the bedside of our beloved descendants. They, after having beguiled themselves with tea and toast, will then bethink them of their letters. By pressing another button, these obedient missives will instantly betake themselves to their readers. Another button will clothe the modern man, who will no doubt sally forth to take the air. He has by this time set aside all such fatiguing methods of motion as walking and will be propelled short distances by motor-feet and, when going for a long outing will simply sit upon a chair and proceed upon his way. One can easily see some justification for the seemingly stupid action of the hero in this film when he casts at last all his electrical appliances to the winds with an air of boredom and disgust.

Now that Bert's good name and reputation are gone, he goes West to start life anew, securing work as a cowboy on the ranch of John Loomis, who has a very pretty daughter named Dot. After Bert has been on the ranch for some time, Loomis notices that Bert and Dot are together quite frequently. Heart-broken, she writes a note, pinning it on the door of the house, telling Bert that she never wants to see him again, as he is a thief. Bert, finding the note, goes in search of Dot, and finds her just as she is about to throw herself and baby over a high cliff. Jose Espanno, knowing this, is anxious to have his son Pedro marry her. Pedro, urged on by his father, proposes to La Belle and is refused. Espanno, upon learning of her refusal to marry his son, tells her that she must either marry Pedro or enter the convent. La Belle answers that she will do neither. Espanno and Pedro, growing angry, force her into a carriage and start on their way to the convent. Jim Blake, an American cowboy, passes them on the road and notices that the girl is being held in the carriage against her will, suspects that the two Mexicans are up to some trick, and decides to follow them. Upon reaching the convent, La Belle is carried in by the two men. Jim, waiting until they have gone, knocks upon the door of the convent; a nun answering, Jim asks to see the young lady who was just carried in. The nun refusing to let Jim see her, he now feels positive that she is being held against her will. Learning from a peon working about the grounds the location of the room in which La Belle is locked, he waits until the night has fallen and then goes back to the convent. Throwing a pebble against the window of La Belle's room, he attracts her attention and tells her that he has come to rescue her. Throwing his lariat up to the window, she catches it, ties it to the bed-post in her room, and slides down the rope into Jim's arms. Taking her upon his horse, they ride back to La Belle's home, where they arrive just in time to find Espanno and Pedro robbing the safe of all the valuable papers belonging to La Belle. Jim forces them at the point of a revolver to leave the house, saving La Belle's fortune and winning her as his wife.

THE SILVER LINING.—That Mrs. Stewart felt worried and ill at ease there could be no doubt. Her only son had married against his father's wishes. The father was inexorable and had absolutely refused to forgive his son for disregarding his wishes in the matter. William Stewart had considered it an understood fact that his son was to marry his partner's daughter, and now just from boyish fancy for a pretty face to have his plans so completely blown to pieces was anything but agreeable.

The bride's father had also objected, but for a different reason, he feared that his gentle little daughter would not be happy with such swell city folks, till she assured him that her visits to her cousin in the city had prepared her for just such surroundings as she was going to. Besides she felt assured that Mrs. Stewart would welcome her with open arms.

Mrs. Stewart did receive her and with many kind and tactful suggestions regarding dress and manner enabled her to become very popular in their set.

This, together with her youth and beauty, had somewhat mollified the elder Stewart's resentment toward his son's wife, so Wesley Stewart smiled triumphantly as with proud and happy eyes he beheld her many little victories.

It was, therefore, doubly humiliating to have her brother Silas spoil everything by his untimely visit.

Silas could stand the separation no longer—he must find out for himself whether his sister was really as happy as her letters declared.

Mrs. Stewart was giving an elaborate dinner in honor of her daughter-in-law when Silas was announced, but Rose in her joy at the unexpected visit of her brother, forgot all save his presence, and danced and frolicked in great joy, to the consternation of the guests.

All of which, however, would no doubt have been overlooked had not Silas forgotten the little restraint placed on him at home and behaved at the table as only a very hungry lad can.

The guests, led by the haughty and vindictive Mrs. Gilbert, swept from the room, leaving Rose and her untutored brother to finish their repast undisturbed.

Silas' hunger being somewhat appeased, he discovered that they were alone, and calling the more engrossed Rose's attention to this apparent slight, her first impulse was to return home with her brother, and after her husband entered and accused Silas of humiliating them, her impulse was hardened into decision.

Thoroughly frightened at his hasty words, and their effect on his wife's feelings, Wesley did all in his power to pacify her, but without avail. He would, however, have soon overtaken her and brought her back had he not been thrown from his horse and laid up.

She had not even answered his letter written as soon after the accident as he was able, imploring her forgiveness and return.

The reason he had received no reply he was unable to guess, for he did not know that his father upon receiving it to post had carefully opened it and believing he was acting for the best, had cut the letter in two and had sent only that portion that told Rose that her husband intended leaving the country.

Finally recovering sufficient strength to travel, he determined to see his wife and prevailed upon his father to accompany him, though much against his will, where they found Rose slowly recovering from a severe sickness.

Upon learning of the deception practiced upon her, she not only forgave her father-in-law, but insisted upon her husband being equally magnanimous.

Her generosity so touched the old man that he insisted on taking Silas back with him, declaring that he should be put through college at his expense.

Yes, we did have considerable trouble with the first few machines we shipped out, but trouble shows what's in a man and in this case it has shown that we are still able to make the best motion picture machine running. There's no use going into details about what those troubles were; we've overcome them all (so the users of the machine say) and anyway we don't like to talk about unpleasant things. But don't take our word for anything about the perfected No. 6. Find out for yourself. If your film exchange can't show you one, write us, mentioning the name of your exchange.

Just A Word Concerning Our Releases for the Coming Week

Tuesday's "Bison" release, "The Man From Texas," is an exceptionally good Western picture, full of action throughout, and is sure to please the most fastidious.

Friday's "Bison" release, "Company "D" to the Rescue," we fully believe, as do others who have seen this picture projected, far surpasses any former subject produced by this company, and you will remember that we have produced a number of remarkable pictures, such as: Young Deer's Gratitude, Young Deer's Bravery, and the Squaw's Sacrifice. Such subjects as those mentioned will force our competitors to "travel some" to produce their equal. We might say further that with the aid of a detachment of the California State Troops, and using thirty-five talented horses, we have achieved in the subject "Company "D" to the Rescue," what we believe to be the cream of perfection in the motion picture art,

It is needless to go into detail concerning Ambrosio and Itala releases, other than to say that we are receiving subjects from these concerns and releasing same simultaneously to their releases abroad. We not only release them on corresponding dates, but receive the best of subjects produced by these companies.

Have we your order for Friday's release: "Company "D" to the Rescue"? If not you are a loser.

"TRANSFUSION"

Length 960 Feet

This is what I call a film classic! For it not only tells a beautiful love story, but is educational. It shows the process by which blood is transfused from a healthy person to an ailing one. All this is worked in as part of the love story. The whole plot is intensely absorbing, the acting is pluperfect, the photography clear and distinct, the staging masterly! Every film like this, used in your theater, adds just that much to your prestige and your box office receipts; and takes away just that much from your competitor. Beg for it. Borrow it. Or, if necessary, swipe it!

RELEASED THURSDAY, MARCH 31st

"HARD CASE"

Length 970 Feet

This is another you will appreciate. It depicts one chapter from the world-wide struggle for hard cash and is full of suspense and surprises, the two factors so necessary in a good play, whether pictured or otherwise. If you have not had "Mother Love" (released March 7) and "The Time Lock Safe" (released March 17) sit down this minute and write a strong letter to your exchange. Keep ding-donging at 'em till they give you Imp films regularly. We honestly think Imp films are now the best in the world. And hundreds of exhibitors say that very same thing.

LISTEN TO THE CINCINNATI FILM EXCHANGE:—

"We think that the IMP Company are the best American Manufacturers in the business to-day. We think you are the coming people and will make them all straighten up and take notice. Assuring you of our co-operation and with best wishes, we remain yours very truly, CINCINNATI FILM EXCHANGE."

WE ANSWER THREE QUESTIONS RIGHT HERE:—

(1st) —We pledge you our word that the story circulated through the newspapers to the effect that Judge Noyes' decision gives the trust "exclusive rights to manufacture moving pictures" is, to say the least, untruthful and grossly misleading.

(2nd)—There is not the remotest danger that we will be compelled to close our Imp factory for even the fraction of a minute.

(3rd) —Imp films will be released regularly forever. Nothing short of the sudden death of our whole factory can prevent it. We are violating no laws, nor do we ever expect to.

The Eye and the Picture.

WHERE TO SIT IN THE THEATER.

The human eye was defined by Helmholtz, the German physicist, as being an imperfect optical instrument. Nevertheless the most superficial study of what the eye does and can do, shows that it has properties not possessed by the most perfect microscope or telescope ever made. It has one property in particular which is a very wonderful one. This is called "accommodation," which is controlled indirectly from the brain and directly by the set of muscles or nerves by which the eye is actuated.

This faculty of accommodation means simply that the normal eye can "accommodate" itself to seeing clearly an object near to it or distant from it. This distinguishes the eye from optical instruments such as the microscope, telescope and the photographic lens, which have to be focused in order that images of near or distant objects, as the case may be, may be received on the ground glass or sensitized surface.

Now what has this to do with moving pictures? We will endeavor briefly to tell the reader. In a recent number of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, a correspondent complained of certain imperfections, or alleged imperfections, in a noted film. We replied to him that probably he sat too near the picture and therefore saw too much. Everybody knows that if you go to a theater or any public entertainment and you sit near the stage the illusion that you go to see is robbed of much of its effect. We, ourselves, recently have had to suffer this loss, because it is our business to get as near to the picture as possible in order to closely scrutinize its technical and other qualities. But in doing so we make allowances; we realize that we are seeing the picture under more or less abnormal circumstances. In other words, for the completeness of the illusion we are sitting too near the pictures.

Distance lends enchantment to the view, and our correspondent lost that enchantment by sitting too near the picture. Hence his hypercritical expression of opinion. Where, then, is the proper, or rather the best place to sit in a moving picture theater for the purpose of getting the best view of the picture? That depends upon the quality of the sight of the individual. Some of us are long-sighted, some of us are short-sighted, but most of us are of normal vision; that is to say, we see an object placed ten inches from the eye with proper clearness, one of the tests of vision.

Much, then, depends upon the condition of the eye of the individual when going to see moving pictures. A short-sighted man, for example, might get into the front row of a moving picture theater and yet not see too much of the picture on the screen, as did our correspondent, because, unless he wore correcting glasses, nature is more or less of a blur to him, so that the very defect of his eyes would produce the necessary effect of softness and illusion. On the other hand, a long-sighted man would probably find himself in the predicament of our correspondent and would see too much. With advancing years, as is well known, the sight has probably lengthened, that is to say, the crystalline lens of the eye flattens and the eye becomes telescopic; and so it sees distant objects sharply and near objects less distinctly.

What we are driving at in this article is this: that as the focal properties of the eyes of individuals vary, it clearly follows that in going into a moving picture theater or into a church or any other public building, the sight of the individual must be accommodated to what he is looking at. There is, then, for each one of us a proper place in a moving picture theater to sit for getting the proper effect of illusion of the picture. It is not necessary for us to see the details of the actors' make-up, nor the very finest lines of facial expressions, nor is it necessary for us to have the impression, as our correspondent appears to have had, that we are looking at a series of giants on the screen, provided that our eyes are in proper order or properly corrected by spectacles. One can obviate all this by sitting at a suitable distance from the screen. There is certainly no pleasure in seeing the brush marks on scenery or the paint on the actresses' faces. All of us go to a theater for the purpose of participating in an illusion and not for destroying it. We can see too much, just as, if we get too far off, we can see too little. The happy mean must be chosen.

We who write this happen to be short-sighted, so we always get fairly near the screen. It happened that we saw the very picture referred to by our correspondent from a position near the stage, and yet, though the picture might have been open to criticism in parts, as all pictures are, we were not conscious of the defects and the drawbacks to which he made reference. In fact, we saw the picture several times, and on no single occasion did we find ourselves thinking as he did. On the other hand, on the same occasion, when we saw this Moses picture, even despite our short-sightedness, we found ourselves too near the screen in regard to one subject. That was the Pathe picture of "The Jockey." Here the horses assumed almost mammoth proportions, striking us as somewhat unnatural. But we made allowance and were conscious that had we sat about midway in this particular theater, the horses would have looked natural in size to us. We write this article for the purpose of drawing attention to the fact that the eye in its variation is an important factor. There is, in short, a proper place for each one of us to sit in a moving picture theater for the purpose of getting the effect aimed at by the manufacturers.

The Picture on its Trial.

Last week and on many other previous occasions we defended the picture from the attacks of its vicious enemies—those enemies who can see no good in it and who are bribed and subsidized by vaudeville and theatrical interests (for that is the plain English of it) to "down" the moving picture on every possible opportunity. We shall not relax our efforts to secure for the picture a fair showing in the entertainment field of the United States, a showing which we demand simply on the technical, artistic and histrionic merits of the pictures. We shall certainly not relax those efforts, although for this week we desire to suspend them, merely for the purpose of briefly considering in this article another danger, and that a somewhat insidious one, to which the picture is being subject.

Last week we defended the picture against the charges of unsuitability, obscenity and the like, that were brought against it. Now we want to put it on its trial ourselves. We ask our exhibiting readers whether it is or is not their experience that its holding power, its drawing power, on the public, is in possible danger of speedy slackening and loosening. Within the last week or two we have been asked by many intelligent people in this city who have watched the inroads of the vaudeville element into the moving picture field whether the picture will last. "Do you think it will last?" That has been the question put to us many times. Moreover, it has been contended by many of those who are admirers of the picture and steady patrons of the moving picture theater that it is hardly strong enough by itself to sustain an hour or an hour and a half's entertainment. "Not enough in it!" has been the comment of many intelligent people who admire the picture, per se, and appreciate its good qualities.

We think these points worth taking notice of and seriously considering; and we ask our exhibiting readers to also seriously consider them. One well-known moving picture expert who has traveled this country and foreign countries in connection with moving pictures gave it as his general opinion that the picture needed strengthening in the direction of the lecture end of matters, a state of things that we have discussed before. Said this gentleman: "When I go to a moving picture theater I observe there are many people who do not seem to understand the stories, and whom I believe would appreciate hearing good educated lecturers who understand the stories shown on the screen." "But, probably to carry out this scheme," continued our friend, "I think that the film makers should so produce pictures that they would be suitable for monological treatment." In other words, films especially prepared for lecture purposes. This struck us as an exceedingly good idea and one which we commend to the manufacturers.

Now, as we have said, over and over again, we are not alarmists and agitators.. This is a function we leave to individuals of not too excessive intellectuality, whose brains are unequal to the task of anything of a constructive nature. But we make it our business from day to day and from week to week to study all possible phases of the moving picture, with a view to watching, and keeping in touch with its trend. We think, as we have said before, that "the picture will go on"; that its future is assured.

At the same time it behooves all those having its interests at heart, to do all that lies in their power to keep the picture popular with the public, both in respect of its photographic and dramatic qualities and the like; and in the manner of its presentation by all complementary agencies. By complementary agencies we mean good music, sound effects; and as we have pointed out in another article this week; the union of the phonograph with the photograph.. Take the sound effect aspect: There are few men with the genius of Mr. Lyman H. Howe, whose sound effects are marvels of ingenuity efficiency and verisimilitude. Howe's work in popularizing the moving picture is of an enormous value simply from the point of view of his sound effects.

We have put the picture on its trial. We constitute ourselves its advocate, both for and against, as well as its judge; and this is our verdict. The picture itself is all right but it has not been given as good a showing as it deserves, before the public. That is why every now and again we hear these questions: "Will it last?" "Is it strong enough to hold an audience for an hour and a half?" "Is there enough in it?" and the like. To all these question of course there is only one possible answer from our standpoint, and that is in the affirmative. At the same time we consider it our duty to bring home to manufacturers, renters and exhibitors, the urgent necessity of doing their best for the picture in the eye of a public notoriously fickle, and likely to desert the picture as it has deserted melodrama and other forms of entertaiment which did not please them.

Max Florence, president and general manager of the Trent & Wilson Film Exchange, and four of the largest and best equipped motion picture theaters in the country, the "Luna," "Isis," "Shubert" and "Elite," all located in Salt Lake City, Utah, is just recovering from a severe attack of typhoid-pneumonia from which he has been confined to his bed for the past few weeks. He is still in a very weakened condition, but is convalescing rapidly, and his physicians say that he will soon be restored to health. The contemplated improvements in his various theaters, requiring an expenditure of several thousand dollars, have consequently been delayed, but work will be resumed as soon as he has recovered sufficiently to persosally sueprintend it.

THE OPTICS OF THE MOVING PICTURE

By Thomas Bedding.

CHAPTER II.

Functions of the Condenser.

Let us endeavor to tell the reader in as simple language as possible what are the precise functions of the condensers in a moving picture projection machine. To begin with, last week we saw that light is of necessity a point, that is to say, the theoretical condition to strive for in the projection is an electric arc, infinitely small but infinitely luminous. That is obvious. If we were working with a large sheet of flame, as in the old days when oil lamps were used for projection purposes, then most of the light would of necessity be lost; moreover it is not easily controlled by the lens end of matters.

Even though our light be the theoretical point it is equally susceptible of loss, that is to say, it has to be brought under control in order to be effective in forming, or helping to form, the picture on the screen. Suppose we followed the path of the rays as they leave the luminous point. Most of them go straight on to the picture and pass through it. But others diverge, pass outside the picture, and are lost or scattered, taking no part in forming or projecting the picture on the screen. Then in order to prevent the escape of these rays we use lenses to condense (or compress) them; hence the name "condenser." These lenses or condensers gather up the rays as they leave the point of light in the crater of the electric arc, pass those rays through the picture and then carry them on to the projection lens, which in its turn casts the enlarged picture on the sheet.

The condensers in general use are usually two in number, each consisting of a plano convex glass, placed in a round metal cell so that the flat sides of the glasses are turned outward. The condensers should be of colorless glass, free from surface markings or internal flaws, air bubbles, striæ or other defects. These defects, of course, interfere with the passage of the light rays through them, and so there is a loss of light or the image is degraded.

What decides the size of these condensers? Roughly it is this. Their diameter should exceed the diagonal of the picture to be projected. The diagonal of a single moving picture is roughly 1⅝ inches, so that the diameter of the condensers should exceed that measurement in order that the whole of the image is included within the circumference of the cone of light which the condensers have to form.

What would happen, supposing condensers were not used? Merely that the picture on the screen would only show that part of it which was actually in front of the light. The intensity of this light is governed by the amount of it which the condensers collect and converge into the projecting lens. Substitute for the condensers in a projection machine a sheet of ground glass, the picture would be fairly well illuminated but the glass could not collect sufficient light from the luminous point, so that practically none of it would be converged into the projection lens.

The condensers in a projection system serve, it will be seen, a double function. They collect the light rays by preventing them from scattering and then they condense or focalize them on to the projection lens. Indeed, condensers are actually lenses of definite foci and practically form the images. We do not say that you could take photographs with them, because they are not corrected for the purpose, but they have a capacity of bringing light rays to a sharp focus.

The position of the light point in relation to the condensers is easily found by a simple experiment. It is, roughly, at the back focus of the condensers. It comes to this: the point of light should be approximately in the back focus of the condensers in order that a perfect cone of rays may be transmitted through the picture and then converged on the projection lens. If light and condenser are too near each other, dark shadows will be seen on the sheet. If they are too far back the margin of the picture will have colored fringes. The correct position for the condensers is at a point in the axis of the light where the rays illuminate the picture aperture and converge the rays into the projection lens. That point is approximately, as we have said, at a distance equal to the back focus on a pair of condensers.

The foci of single plano convex condensers are usually as follows:

Diameter.	Focus.
4 inches	5½ or 6½ inches
4⅛ inches	5½ or 6½ inches
4½ inches	5½ or 6½ inches
5 inches	6 inches
5½ inches	8 inches
6 inches	10 inches
6½ inches	10 inches
7 inches	12 inches
8 inches	12 inches
9 inches	14 inches
10 inches	15 inches
12 inches	18 inches
14 inches	21 inches

When two single condensers are combined, the focus of the combination is half that of the single elements: thus the focus of a pair of 6-inch plano convex condensers would be 3 inches, measured from the center of the combination. A sheet of ground glass between the condensers or between the latter and the light aids the better diffusion of the light.

Mounting Condensers.

Pairs of condensers, mounted or unmounted, can be bought at the following prices:

Diameter in inches.	Focus in inches.	Pair of Lenses mounted.	Per Single Lens unmounted.
4	5½ or 6½	$4.00	$1.25
4½	5½ or 6½	6.00	1.50
5	6½	7.50	1.75
8	8	12.00	3.00
8	12	32.00	7.50
9	14	40.00	10.00

The condensers should be set loosely in the cell with the convex or round sides facing each other, but not touching. Very often a sheet of finely ground glass if placed between the lenses will overcome any slight flaws which might be in them. This also tends to equalize the illumination. Of course, in theory, the condensers should be of "optical glass" in order that the utmost purity should be obtained, but then the cost is so prohibitive that it is not to be thought of. Still the purer, clearer and more brilliant are the condensers the more efficiently will they perform the double office which we have described, namely, that of collecting the light rays and then of condensing or focusing them upon the picture aperture.

The censorship bug-a-boo is on wing again. This is about the time for its annual development. Every March or April the moral sensibilities of certain people seem peculiarly sensitive. It really looks suspicious that people who will stand for the Fall and Winter season make such a bold attack when the time approaches for the discarding of the Winter garments for the Spring styles.

I think if all the manufacturers of films would tack on to the tail end of their subjects a fac-simile of a certificate that the film has been examined and passed by the National Board of Censors the film exchanges and exhibitors would be relieved of considerable uneasiness. To give this more convincing effect I would favor the enactment of a law that any manufacturer who attaches such a certificate to his film when same has not been passed upon and approved by the Censors shall be subject to a substantial penalty. I do not think any reputable manufacturer would resort to this. I make this suggestion merely as a step towards meeting the spasmodic movements of fanatics who imagine that the purification of the moral standard of the country is dependent solely upon their efforts.

I have before me now a number of letters from film exchanges in various parts of the country complaining that the local administrations are becoming exceedingly active on the censorship question and asking me if it is not a fact that films are censored. The letters also state that in many places people holding views avowedly inimical to amusements have been selected to visit picture houses and censor the productions. One writer says the authorities of his hamlet insist that no pictures shall be shown until a certificate is deposited with them showing that they have been passed upon by the National Board of Censorship. The last writer upholds my idea that every manufacturer should attach a fac-simile certificate to their productions.

There is something in the whole business that is very much off-color, and a part of this something is that there is a concerted movement against moving pictures without regard to fairness. The present season has clearly demonstrated that the picture places have been stronger in competition with the regular theaters than at any other time since the existence of nickelodeons. In a great number of places owners of theaters have transformed them into picture houses and by judicial management made them pay. No complaints are heard from these sources. Quite to the contrary, the managers are so well pleased with the results, they have decided to continue the policy. Whence comes the trouble? Why, from Mr. Crusty, who owns the only "opree house" in Sound Slumber. Never a season passed that he could not rent his house at least three nights a week and get fifteen dollars for every gol darn night. "Now those pesky picture men have come in and hired Sol Perkins' empty store room and are making money. I plucked up courage and went in to fight them, but the film exchanges tried to get a first mortgage on my house by asking me to pay them $18 a week for three reels of film changed six times a week. I only wanted the films changed six times a week because I wouldn't think of keeping my house open on Sundays. So, sez I, I'll fix 'em; and at the next meeting of the Ladies' Aid Society connected with our church I got my wife to take up the morality question. Gol dern it, no picture men are goin' to come in this place and keep my house closed! 'I'm from Missouri,' as I heard a play actor say one night, 'and you've got to show me.'"

That is the material the picture people have to contend with and they are encouraged by the one-night companies who occasionally stop over to try and recuperate railroad fares to the next town. Old Crusty then uses these people as experts and between the two they impress upon the Common Council of the settlement the avalanche of immorality the moving pictures are responsible for. Then the Councilmen pass their hands over their goatees in a thoughtful mood between draughts of home-made cider and decide to revolutionize the situation.

Have these people ever taken the trouble to figure how many young people the moving picture shows have taken from the streets and street corners? Have they figured on the decrease in the number of dance halls, pool-playing and like places since the establishment of the picture houses? Thousands upon thousands of men and youths will tell you that the nickelodeons are a blessing. Before they came into existence it was a case of wandering aimlessly about the streets, or go to the saloons. If there was more fairness and less prejudice shown in these so-called reform or anti-vice movements they would not be looked upon, as they so frequently are, as subterfuges.

I found the following letter upon my desk yesterday:

"Man About Town.

"Moving Picture World, N. Y. City:

"I want to ask a question and will thank you very much for a fair and square answer. I exhibit moving pictures. I was formerly in the grocery business, but saw what I thought was a good thing and became an exhibitor. In doing this I did not count myself a theatrical man. I went into it as a business man with the idea of conducting it on the same principle as I did the grocery. I started taking licensed films, but at various times I heard of such good Independent films and changed my service on the same principle that I changed from one house to another when I did not like certain goods. It made no difference to me whether the goods were made by a trust or independents. I was notified by my exchange one day that on account of my disposition to flop from licensed exchanges to independents so often I would have to put up a guarantee to stay as a licensed exhibitor or drop the service. Now what I want to know is, has any exchange the right to dictate the class of goods I shall get for my place, and where I shall get them?"

I will be frank in this matter and say that, generally speaking, the right of dictation does not exist in this respect. At the same time, what are you going to do about it? It would seem that an announcement of such a nature by an exchange must be prompted by some ruling of the Motion Picture Patents Company. If such is the case, then the exchange must abide by it or take chances of being subjected to a heavy fine; therefore, the exchange can hardly be blamed in the matter. There is one thing in which the exhibitor is mistaken. The picture business and the grocery business are not similar, particularly that part of the picture business operating under the licensed system. The grocer boys and sells his stock. The picture man is only a renter and under certain conditions. Not being a lawyer, and never having heard of a test case on the point, I am not prepared to give the answer the correspondent evidently expects. In other words, I am not prepared to fix a limit to an agreement or guarantee a film exchange may exact before renting films to an exhibitor. I am inclined to the opinion that the film exchange is very much in the position of the landlord—the sky is the limit.

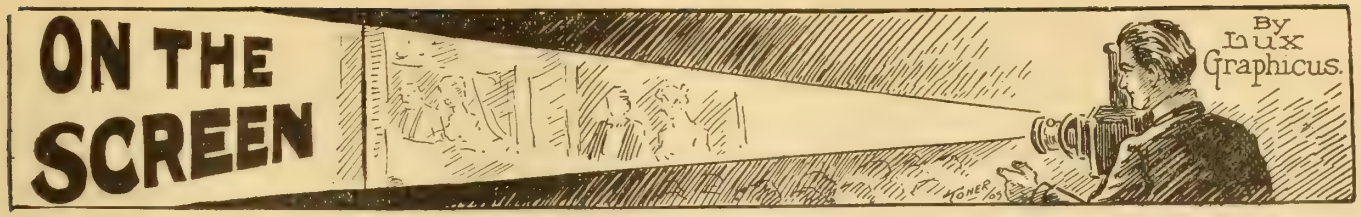
Having legal matters in view reminds me that last week Jack Binns, the wireless telegraph operator who gained so much fame by sticking to his post on the steamer Republic until she was about to take her dive into the depths of the sea after being rammed by the Florida, appeared in the Supreme Court of New York as complainant against the Vitagraph Company. The Vitagraph got on the job right after the collision and issued a film it called "Saved by Wireless." Although it was not a comedy subject, Binns declared that it held him up to ridicule before the public. On cross-examination he admitted he had never seen the film and was depending upon what friends had told him. He said the film gave him notoriety he did not wish; that if he wanted notoriety he had ample theatrical offers immediately after the collision at big weekly salary. He demanded several thousand dollars damages. The court announced that decision would be rendered at a later date.



"I Would Rather Have a Girlie Than an Automobile," is the title of a little song which I heard sung one afternoon, not so long ago, at the American Music Hall on Forty-second street. The singer sang the song as if he meant it. The audience, too, seemed to be somewhat of his way of thinking. Myself, I was in a neutral frame of mind. So I am now. Girlies are very nice things in their way, but, as they say in the North of England, "Women are kittle cattle"; you never know what they are going to do next. But, gentle reader, I will not pursue this platitudinous vein. The first and last word about woman was really said, according to Holy Writ, some few thousand years ago, in the Euphrates Valley at the time of Adam and Eve. So, "enough said."

Of course, there are many who subscribe to the converse of the sentiment of the lilting song, named in line one, paragrah one, of this week's sermon. Many people apparently prefer automobiles to girlies. Most people, however, like both. Amongst the latter I venture to include Mr. William ("Bill") Steiner, who was my host recently in an automobile trip to a far country. "Bill" is an elusive man when you want to get him to talk, and the trap I laid for him was an automobile trip. So off we started on a bright March day; and as we whizzed through the air, Steiner became my unconscious victim and gave an interview according to my favorite formula, that is, of keeping the victim oblivious of the fact that he is talking for publication. For when he is oblivious of that fact, he, as I have pointed out over and over again, talks naturally and earnestly, and is himself, which is what we all ought to be, first, last, and all the time—namely, true to ourselves. We seldom are in the set interview previously arranged for, and handed out, cut and dry.

Steiner is a power in the moving picture field. First of all on account of his personality, which is an enviable one. Steiner is popular with all the patrons of his several exchanges simply by virtue of his business ability, and the fact that he conducts his business on broad, humane principles. This much I saw for myself in the busy little Twenty-eighth street office, which every morning is beset by a crowd of "bees," or operators, who come in from their hives of industry, the moving picture theaters, for fresh honey in the shape of films. Steiner is there to see that the straight game is played and to meet his customers in a broad and intelligent fashion. This, after all, is the secret of success. The figures of the business which Mr. Steiner gave me were the best evidence of the wisdom of his policy. They made me envious, so much so, that as I read them I felt inclined to test the obvious good nature of my host by inviting him to change places.

I do not know how Mr. Steiner would "pan" out in the chair of "Lux Graphicus." Whether he would write as I write, and think as I think. But I think he would make a success of it. And I also think I would make a success, on his lines, of running the Imperial Film Exchange. I hereby invite you, dear William Steiner, to change places. You, to take the profits of "Lux Graphicus," and I to take the profits of the Imperial Film Exchange. This offer holds good for twenty-four hours after date of publication of this issue.

"Been in the business long?" says I, as we bowled along in that Steiner automobile at certainly considerably more than twenty miles an hour. Before answering my question, Mr. Steiner turned to wave a greeting to a moving picture man standing outside his theater, which we passed in our automobile. In fact, in getting out of the city, Steiner seemed to have quite a triumphal procession in receiving the greetings of the moving picture people whom he knew and who knew him at the various theaters which we passed. "Fourteen years," was the reply. Then I learned again that Steiner was a practical maker of moving pictures; took the pictures; sold them successfully; and had a good business before taking up the renting end of things.

It was also quite a surprise for me to learn that Steiner, like many of his competitors in the renting field, knew all the ins and outs of the game, and takes an intelligent interest in it, both from the technical and the economical ends. The moving picture film to him is not merely a trade integer to be handled without reference to its intrinsic quality. No; underneath all his hustling, bustling, and strong business qualities, Steiner conceals a very considerable knowledge of the taking and making of moving pictures. I am always glad to meet this feature in the mind of anybody connected with the moving picture industry. I like to meet big people who are competent to discuss the technical end of moving picture making. And there are not very many in the game.

"Like the business outlook?" said I. Then I got from my host a very clear concept of the entire moving picture business at all ends of the game. So much so, that I am bound to say, it was an agreeable surprise that the busy head of this great and popular exchange could keep himself closely in touch with the direction of things. I was congratulating myself inwardly that Steiner was giving me some really useful information, when—"I Would Rather Have a Girlie Than an Automobile"!! There was a loud report. The inner tube of one of the wheels burst; and our little party surveyed the landscape for about twenty minutes while the necessary repairs were being made.

During this wait the half-dozen of us studied nature and did our best to keep ourselves warm. I learned one little peculiarity of a New York film exchange business. This car leaves the Imperial Film Exchange, on Twenty-eighth street, New York City, each night at ten o'clock; makes a round of the theaters in Brooklyn, Manhattan and the Bronx, and returns to the exchange about four o'clock in the morning, laden with reels that have been shown during the previous day and evening—a very curious little feature of the moving picture business. Verily, one-half the world does not know how the other half lives. Indeed, it was the use of the automobile for rapid communication amongst the theater customers of the Imperial Exchange that led to my having this little ride and getting William Steiner to talk.

So, you see that the automobile is sometimes as unreliable as the eternal feminine. Both are good in their way, but neither can alway be relied upon to be on their best behavior; otherwise life would, indeed, be a heavenly experience. Well, on we went again, only to discover at the end of a few more miles that Imperial high speeding was the cause of running short of gasoline. But this little difficulty was got over with characteristic Steiner-like ingenuity, and we eventually reached our destination, where I had other adventures that are not for this column. "And so home," as the diarist, Samuel Pepys, put it in his famous book, at the end of a delightful day, in which I had learned something about the moving picture game in the country, and added a notable figure to my private gallery of picture personalities.

Mr. Steiner is young, vigorous, progressive, alert, and has the habit of success—a very nice habit to have. It swells your bank account; keeps you feeling good; and gives you an optimistic outlook. I like people with optimistic outlooks. I do not look a very optimistic person myself, but my looks belie me. There is a character in one of Nathaniel Hawthorne's books, who is somewhat of a favorite of mine. She is an old woman whose facial expression belies her real feelings. Although she may seem to be frowning, yet she feels really good and kind. That is me, at times. But there is no occasion to be in any dubiety as regards Mr. Steiner. There is no ambiguity in his face. His outlook is manifestly optimistic. He not only looks on the bright side of things, but is there himself, which is a good thing. That is why the Imperial Film Exchange is so popular, and why Steiner himself is popular with his help and his film men, and why some of his men have been working for him twelve years. William, my boy, I enjoyed my ride very much. So here's to you and your exchange.

A WORD OF GOOD CHEER TO ALL FRIENDS OF THE MOVING PICTURE.

By W. Stephen Bush.

Let us not forget our good nature or suffer loss of temper just because they are once more hurling stones and sticks in our direction. Let us rather rejoice and be well satisfied with the place we hold, well up in the van of God's great parade of civilizing forces. Looking at and talking to those who would malign us, let us not call back names at them and let us cheerfully give to those who seek it, the copyright of such expressions as "recruiting stations of vice" and "dens of iniquity." Calling names has never in the history of our race affected our destinies in any way, and to-day billingsgate is less of an argument than it ever was before.

Nor let us be alarmed because the sticks and stones fly at us from the editorial sanctum or from the bench of what, for want of a better name, is generally known as justice. From our friends the newspapers we may then hope for better treatment, when we help to fill up the advertising space devoted to the public amusements, and not till then. In the days of Horace Greeley and Raymond Jones and Charles A. Dana the editorial ethics was not formulated in the counting room, but these are not the days of Greeley and Dana, but—well, never mind, we all know the names, anyway. In the meantime, let our journalistic crusaders point to the name of any objectionable picture that has been made by the leading makers of films. I have in the last six months looked at more than ninety per cent. of all films made, and while I have seen much that was imperfect, in bad taste, foolish, inaccurate, cheap, or stupid, I dare anybody to show me a film that was objectionable because of its immorality or viciousness. We are told that some boys, who recently planned to derail a train and then rob the victims, were induced to go into this enterprise by looking at moving pictures. For the sake of truth and justice, name the pictures. I look through the list of Edison and Pathe and Biograph and Vitagraph and Essanay and Selig and Gaumont and Urban-Eclipse and Kalem and even Lubin releases, and there is not one that would suggest even to the most impressionable mind the idea of wrecking a train or engaging in any sort of crime or mischief. The quality among the independents may not be so high, but there is nothing degrading or demoralizing in any of them. There is, it is true, a tendency to cater to the craze for Indians and cowboys, and the judicious are grieved by having a lot of virtuous cowboys, wicked Mexicans and depraved half-breeds and fighting Indians parade on the moving picture screen in endless and monotonous succession, but most people, who are above the age of messenger boys, newsboys and bellboys, see these things without any desire to cross the ferry to Hoboken and strike the Western trail. When the moving picture is arraigned as a criminal it ought in common fairness to be informed of the nature of the charge. Let our criticising friends study the lists of the releases of the past six months and realize that the percentage of educational, scenic, classic, religious, industrial, historic and generally instructive pictures has increased more than a hundredfold. There is not a comedy that is not clean, though some of them, it must be confessed, are dreadfully stupid. Our leading film makers draw for their subjects upon the Bible, upon the best creations of literature, upon the classic and legitimate drama. Do you, friends and critics, realize that the moving picture has taken its inspiration from Shakespeare, from Tennyson, from Robert Browning, from Longfellow, from Balzac, from Hawthorne, from Victor Hugo, from Goethe, from Cervantes, from Zola, from the two Dumas, from Mark Twain and a galaxy of other names, illustrious in the annals of mankind? It has taken from the pages of secular history such splendid epochs as the glories of mythology, the glories of Rome, the brilliant days of the Republic of Venice, and the days when the Bourbon Kings were first in their glory and then in their fall and sorrow. It has shown us episodes from such instructive periods of human history as the French revolution, the Napoleonic wars, the events in our own country from its colonization to the Civil War. I could fill this column with fine religious subjects, such as "Saul and David," "Solomon's Judgment," "Jephtha's Daughter," "The Daughter of the Sun," "Pagan and Christian," "The Birth of Christ," "The Blind Man of Jerusalem," "The Monk's Mother," "The Golden Lily," "Joan of Arc," "The Prodigal Son," "Christian Martyrs," "The Way of the Cross," "The Holy City," "The Cloister's Touch," "The Baby's Shoe," "The Salvation Army Lass," "Joseph Sold by His Brethren," "Samson and Delilah," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "The Life of Moses' and dozens of others. The spirit that produces pictures of this kind need fear nothing from abuse, and it is not the spirit that would promote what the writers on the daily press and the learned judges are pleased to describe as "juvenile depravity.' Our friends of the quill and the ermine will yet realize that the moving picture of to-day is one of the most potent forces for the progress of the race, for the dissemination of useful knowledge and for the promotion of all those things at which the good theater aims. The moving picture reaches thousands where the theater reaches not even hundreds. In every drama that I have lately seen in moving pictures there was not even a vestige of anything prurient, suggestive or demoralizing; on the contrary, each pointed a strong moral and pointed the moral in a forceful way.

The newspaper, the pulpit and the bench are, and of right ought to be, not enemies but friends of the moving picture, and let us, fellow-exhibitors, do our share to bring about this co-operation. We can do this by deluging our friends with tickets and prayers to come and see our show, and when it is over we will all be shaking hands and wondering why we did not get together long ago.

WHY NOT DO THINGS RIGHT?

F. H. Richardson.

Sunday evening, March 6, I paid my fifteen cents and entered the Bijou Dream Theater, on Twenty-third street. Sauntering down the aisle as though I owned the whole works, I pre-empted a seat and settled myself to enjoy the show, observe its excellence or silently roast anything not up to the mark. The Bijou is a nice house and, in the main, the show was creditable, but while the films were excellent and the operator doing pretty well, considering the difficulties under which he worked, the management of the house had made it utterly impossible to project a really first class picture. The light was good and quite well handled, but the machine is set so very close to the curtain that a wide-angle lens is necessary, and, as we all know, the results, where they are used, are not the best. Possibly it is not practical to set the machine further back, but if it is, a far better projection would be had. But the thing utterly without excuse was this: at the rear of the main floor was a cluster of white lights in ground glass globes. The light from this cluster struck the lower half of the curtain, illuminating it sufficiently to kill the picture's brilliancy. Shading the lights would be a very simple matter, and that such an important item be not attended to is inexplicible. The public is entitled to the best possible show and the manager who deliberately neglects to perform so simple an operation as shading a cluster of lights, which greatly detract from the effect of his picture, is not doing justice to his patrons. It is just such things as this that cause the public to tire of motion pictures. They are unsatisfactory. The public does not know what is wrong, but they do know the picture is "nothing extra" in the way of excellence, and they say, "Oh, yes, moving pictures are all right in a way, but——!" and the "but" represents poor projection, caused, too often, by just such things as I have spoken of. With modern projection mechanism, under proper conditions and with modern films, it is possible to put on a really magnificent show. A show far ahead of the ordinary cheap vaudeville stunts one sees in moving picture theaters. To accomplish this, however, great care and intelligence must, absolutely must, be used at every stage of the game. A first class operator who not only knows how, but applies his knowledge, is a prime essential, of course. Then neither ignorance nor carelessness must be met with anywhere or the result will be spoiled, just as it is spoiled in the case I have cited. In naming this instance I do it not only for the good of the individual house, but for the good of the business as a whole. It is quite possible the manager of the Bijou does not know the light is spoiling the effect of his picture, but if so it was the duty of the operator to inform him of the fact.

ABSURDITIES IN THE PRODUCING FIELD.

By A. Klawhammer.

Motion pictures are popular because the public believe, to a large extent, that all seen on the screen is taken from real life and is free from the exaggerated and unnatural situations represented on the stage.

If we wish to maintain this popularity for the moving pictures our manufacturers must endeavor to increase the quality of the productions, before increasing the quantity and pay more attention to the details.

"On a Racket" is a production which should have never passed the Board of Censorship, as it is demoralizing, to say the least. If the censors believe that they can cure drunkenness by showing vile scenes of men under the influence of liquor, they are sadly mistaken. Such a film could find a place in a smoker, but not in a theater. It is a very bad example to our young men and not the proper thing to show to ladies and children.

"The Girl and the Judge" offers us a very bad specimen of a jurist, a disgrace to the bar. We do not believe that in any civilized country a judge would be allowed to preside over a murder trial when he was an intimate friend of the afflicted family, an eyewitness to the tragedy and not only a friend of the accused man but a rival for the hand of the girl. No, such a judge could not be impartial in his rulings.

In the same production we have another absurdity. If the microscopic lens was arranged so that the rays of the sun could ignite the powder, burn the hand of the judge, burn a hole in a card, the same rays would have burned a hole in the table, and this fact would have been a more conclusive proof.

"Politics" would have been a very good picture if the producers had not made a vulgar display of night shirts in the last scene. The story is well worked and very amusing, but the appearance of a minister barefooted and garbed in a long night shirt shocked many persons, as no minister of the gospel would dare perform a marriage in such out-of-place disguise. The audience was further shocked when the parents arrived also garbed in long night shirts.

"The Passing Shadow" is an old theme. The production is anti-American, when the producers show us the old feudal style of parents selecting the bride and forcing her on the son. The father could have invited the girl and presented her to his son, but to force the son to declare himself at once produces a very painful scene.

As long as the son marries his own choice the father has a right to disinherit his son, but in this case the son should not be left a pauper as the producers take good care to show us that father and son are partners, the name on the door, reading "Carlton & Son." The father and partner cannot rob his son and partner of his share in the business, although they can dissolve partnership. The poverty of the young couple has no reason.

The son has good intentions in presenting a Christmas gift to his father, it is a sentiment worthy to be noted, showing a good filial disposition, but the producers should have remembered that, at the present time, the son was practically penniless, had to pawn the locket of his wife to buy coal, and that even if he had received some money from his sister, he was in no position to go to a jewelry store to purchase a Christmas gift for his father. The producers should have also remembered that a gift should not be considered at its intrinsic value but by the sentiment governing the giver. A single flower, a mere Christmas card would have answered the purpose and appeared more real, showing that although poor and starving they could remember the father.

It is very sad that in this picture the producers could not manage to have the sister in the last scene. As she had shown her love for her brother and had deprived herself of her pin money to support him, it would have been a good reward for her to be there at the reunion of father and son. The sister, presenting the baby to the old father, would have made a good finish.

"The Livingston Case."—The strongest clue against the boy is the blood on the curtain. If we examine the picture closely, we see that the boy had no chance whatever to collect any blood on his hand. After the murder by the father, the boy appears, he is stunned at the sight of the girl on the floor and at his father kneeling near her, and in horror he steps back steadying himself by taking hold of the curtain. He never touched the body of the girl, nor the hand of his father. How could he have gathered any blood to carry to the curtain?

The audience is very keen and at the experiment of the hand mark prints, a lady said: "The prints should not match as the boy had no blood on his hands."

When the girl is murdered it is in bright daylight; she is returning from a promenade, as her riding whip shows. Yet the girl is not discovered before the next morning, when the butler goes to pull the curtains and open the window. This sounds impossible that a rich girl, surrounded by so many relatives and servants, should not have been missed before the next morning and it looks very improbable that no one went to close the curtains and close the room for the night, without discovering the body of the girl.

Although we cannot control the passions of mankind, we should not show what is most improbable. An old gardener with such a good face would rather show the disposition of a faithful servant and not of a villain with an uncontrollable temper. In this case the producers should have selected a man with a less sympathetic face, not a devoted old servant, but a man better fitted for the role of the bad employee, ready to strike the daughter of his master to satisfy the love of his own boy. A devoted servant and good father would have reasoned with his son and not encouraged him in his folly.

THE "FREE USHER" EVIL.

By Bertram Adler, of the Thanhouser Company.

In waging our war on evils—real and mythical—in the motion picture business, let us not overlook a very actual and sure-enough evil—that of the "free usher." Here is an evil that can be brought straight home to show managers by our critics, one that is a part and parcel of the picture show management system as it exists to-day.

The free usher! How easy is he to secure! And how reluctant to jump the job the way the other employees do! And so cheap—all he wants is the honor of gracing your main aisle! Of course, he often wants some other things, including the chance to pick up acquaintanceship with young women through bestowal of the favors one in his exalted position has at his touch.

Sometimes his intentions are innocent, and sometimes they aren't. When they are, they can't harm his employer, except that they interfere with his order of arrangements in a slight measure. When they aren't, he is likely to bring the employer into unfavorable court notice—together with the motion picture business as a whole.

Therefore the exhibitor ought to take no chances. The irresponsible young man who offers his services free nights is not the ideal usher. The cheap usher, he may be, but better a more expensive usher—one who for a few dollars can be held to strict account by the exhibitor. Right here is the trouble. He cannot criticise the actions of one over whom he has no control.

This little talk is inspired by a story that has reached me regarding the doings of an usher in a New York nickelodeon—a "free usher." The story isn't a pleasant one—what's the use of repeating it? Necessarily it gained wide reputation in the region of the show where the scamp ushered, and careful parents are keeping their children from the place. Luckily, it hasn't got into the papers—this time a lone exhibitor, and not the moving picture business as a whole, suffered. No learned judge got a chance to condemn our great institution and no clergyman made the incident serve as a topic.

If some such calamity as this had happened, we would have had a hard time showing that the certain usher was not one of Judge O'Sullivan's "hounds of vice that infest these places," since the offender was directly and officially connected with a picture show. Eventually we would have worsted our critics, but not until their attacks had gained publicity in the great million-copies-a-day dailies—and our answers in The Moving Picture World with its necessarily exclusive circulation.

Of course, there are those who usher in picture shows simply for the sake of the fun the neophyte finds in it, and others—friends of the exhibitor—who obligingly help him out on rush nights. These will exist while picture shows exist. Encourage them while they observe the rules of propriety—and when they don't replace them with paid employees who are strictly accountable to you for their every action every minute in every hour of their working day.

High class Independent exchanges are comparatively rare. Within the past twelve months several of these businesses have started and have only flattered to deceive. Indeed, one of the most commonly expressed complaints that we hear amongst the Independent exhibitors is that there is a singular paucity of exchanges giving good service and conducted on proper business lines. No such objection as this attaches to the Paramount Film Exchange, at 61 West Fourteenth street, New York City, of which Mr. I. Goetz is vice-president and general manager. Mr. Goetz obtained his experience of the business by handling licensed films. He is well known in the film business, having started in at a comparatively early stage, therefore he is extremely well equipped with a knowledge of both sides of the film business, Licensed and Independent. He is with the Paramount Film Company to make it of real use and convenience to the Independent exhibitor in every possible way. We, therefore, recommend the Independent exhibitor to get into touch with this up-to-date and progressive film exchange.

The Essanay Company's Chicago producers are still devoting their efforts to comedy productions. There are a number of extraordinarily good subjects now made, including one or two big, full-reel comedies, which will probably be booked for early release.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Best Projection Surface.—Grove City, Pa., wants to know if white plaster is suitable for a curtain and what preparation he should put on it.

Clean, white plaster is, in the writer's humble opinion, the best curtain possible on which to project pictures. No preparation is necessary, but the plaster must be clean and white. Any spots may be easily removed by lightly sandpapering with No. OO sandpaper wrapped on a block of wood.

Calcium Light.—"Countryman" asks how to use calcium light to get the best results. My friend, you are putting me up against a task that would take at least one, if not two, pages of this paper to answer. I would suggest you write to some of the manufacturers of calcium light projection apparatus, asking for the instruction pamphlets they send out with their outfits, enclosing stamps, of course. One or two things, however, I will mention, as they are of vital importance. So regulate your two gases that the light burns without hissing. It has been some time since I have handled calcium, but if I remember rightly, the hissing indicates too much hydrogen. The flame should show a reddish fringe at its top. Don't let your lime get pitted too deeply before turning it to a fresh spot. Sorry I cannot give you detailed information covering the whole matter, but it is out of the question.

Focal Length of Condensers.—Owosso, Mich., writes, in part, as follows: Regarding the focal length of condensers as related to projection lens, I am showing a picture 9 x 4—12 x 8, at 70 feet. What focal length condensers should be used? Get good picture, but don't know what focal length lens we have, as we seldom break one.

Presumably you mean your picture is 9 feet 4 inches by 12 feet 8 inches and this would, at 70 feet, indicate about a 5½-inch projector (equivalent focus). For this you should have, I think, two 7½ lenses. As soon as possible I shall compile and publish a table of focal length condensers to fit any focal length projection lens. You may measure your present lenses as directed on page 424, March 19 issue, under heading "Getting a White Screen." Your remarks concerning Judge O'Sullivan and other matters are well put. Many thanks for your kind words.

Power's No. 5 Shutter Adjustment.—Hagerstown, Md., asks how to measure focal length of condensing lenses, also how to properly adjust shutter of Power's No. 5 mechanism.

You will find directions for measuring condensing lenses on page 424, March 19 issue, under heading "Getting a White Screen." To adjust the Power's No. 5 shutter, loosen the shutter on its spindle and turn the flywheel in the direction it runs until the intermittent sprocket has completed its movement and the cam pin is just half way out of the star slot. Now turn the shutter in the direction it runs until the lower, left hand corner of the aperture is open about a quarter of an inch, or until the edge of the shutter strikes a trifle less than half way up the side of the aperture opening and about half way across the lower edge. The frameup lever must be set in central position before you do this, however. As the star stops traveling a little bit before the pin leave the star, this adjustment mean that the shutter just begins to open as the intermittent stops movin~ and that is as it should be. As there is some lost motion in the shutter you may not strike it precisely right the first time. You may also set the shutter at the beginning of the star movement, which is the way I do it, but this requires some experience. The aperture must be about two-thirds closed when the star begins to move. I have given two methods in these pages in the past for setting shutters absolutely correct, but they are too lengthy to repeat very often. The method I give will answer your purposes, I believe, for the Power's No. 5, but is applicable to no other machine.

Pittsburg, Pa., who asked for help last week, writes that he has made the experiments as I directed without result. Says paint is off a part of the shutter which is shiny and asks if that would affect the picture. It would not. Have sent by mail directions for setting the shutter and advised that, if the trouble is not eliminated after setting, the mechanism must be sent to factory for examination.

IF YOU ARE INTERESTED IN THE MOVING PICTURE BUSINESS, YOU SHOULD SUBSCRIBE FOR THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. $2.00.

The Great Eastern Vaudeville Exchange, who, on January 1, 1910, entered the field for supplying moving picture theaters with first class vaudeville acts, have located at 250 West Forty-second street, and under the guidance of Mr. R. K. Saenger as president and general manager and Mr. L. Flounlacker as vice-president, feel as though they are in a position to more than take care of the wants of their numerous patrons.

Assemblyman Orson J. Weinert, of Erie, introduced a bill, on March 15, in the Senate, at Albany, to amend the penal law by the inclusion of vaudeville and moving picture shows in the list of amusements forbidden on Sunday. The bill would make guilty of a misdemeanor every person or corporation supplying electricity or gas for the prohibited performances, and broaden the law so as to make the operator of a picture machine or the performer in a forbidden exhibition guilty with the producer.

A very excellent idea in announcement slides is being brought to the notice of motion picture theater exhibitors by the Plampin Slide Company, of 64 East Fourteenth street, New York City. This company makes feature announcement slides of the associated manufacturers' pictures. And it does it in this way. It takes the litho of the subject, photographs it and makes a slide of it, including the title and the announcement that it is to be seen at the theater the following day. In other words, these slides, specimens of which we have seen and of which we think highly, are used by motion picture exhibitors in their theaters to tell their audiences what is to be seen on the morrow. This is, as we have said, a very excellent idea. The slides made by the Plampin Slide Company are of good quality and we recommend moving picture exhibitors throughout the country running associated film to get in touch with the Plampin Slide Company.

PATENTS COMPANY GET TEMPORARY INJUNCTION.

Judge Noyes, on Thursday, March 17, granted a temporary injunction against the Independent Moving Pictures Company and the Pantograph Corporation from using cameras that infringe on the patents owned by the Motion Picture Patents Company. He denied contempt proceedings under the order until the case is finally settled by the Court of Appeals. The manager of the Independent Moving Pictures Company assured us over the 'phone that appeal would immediately be taken; meanwhile, Imp films, he said, would be regularly released as usual.

"HALLBERG" EQUIPMENT IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. E. B. Thompson, of Washington, has installed, for the Circle Amusement Company, the newest and most up-to-date moving picture theater in Washington, including a special "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizer, together with the Motiograph No. 1 dissolving flickerless moving picture machine and stereopticon.

This installation is also interesting because it is equipped with the new Mirror Screen, which increases the brillancy and clearness of the picture at least 100 per cent.

The combination of the "Hallberg" Economizer, the Motiograph flickerless machine and the Mirror Screen, together with Electra carbons, makes this exhibit the most up-to-date and the most efficient which could possibly be secured.

LONG LIFE FOR THE GENERAL ELECTRIC RECTIFIER.

A recent advertisement in The Moving Picture World, in which Howard Graham, a prominent moving picture man of Chattanooga, Tenn., claims that the life of 2,600 hours for his General Electric Mercury Arc Rectifier was unusual, has stirred up the jealousy of a Pacific Coast man. D. H. Rockwell, manager of the Coast Theater, Tacoma, Wash., in a letter dated March 5, says: "Mr. Graham isn't in it. We have a tube in commission that to-day we credit with 3,315 hours, and the Lord only knows how much longer it will stick."

As the General Electric Rectifier is being adopted by moving picture men all over the country, Mr. Rockwell's comment is of great interest. In every instance where this device has been installed, a saving in cost of current has been effected, as well as a betterment in picture quality; the proof of very long life for the only "wearoutable" part of the Rectifier is a reassurance to present and prospective users of complete utility.

CHICAGO NOTES.

Mr. I. Van Ronkel, of the American Film Service, informs us that they have obtained a permanent injunction against Messrs. James L. Reilly and Chas. F. Pugh, of the Americna Film Exchange (with headquarters in Pittsburg, Pa.,) restraining them from using the name "American." Mr. Charles Lederer, of the law firm of Adler, Lederer & Schoenbrun, argued the case and claimed that the public, not making the proper difference between the words "film service" and "film exchange," were confused by the name "American" and consequently his clients, the American Film Service, a duly incorporated firm in the State of Illinois, sustained heavy damages. The permanent injunction was granted on Saturday, March 12, 1910.

By the way, I went to Roseland to visit the Roseland Theater, Michigan avenue and 113th street, and was surprised at the crowd in front of the place waiting for a chance to enter. The Roseland shows only straight (but good) pictures, and such crowds of anxious patrons were not noticed in front of the other places. Mr. Berkson, the owner of the theater, does not believe in vaudeville and he sticks to his opinion that good pictures are strong enough to crowd his house. Mr. Berkson can give vaudeville acts if he wishes to do so, as the Roseland Theater was built for a vaudeville house, has a large, well equipped stage, dressing rooms, etc., but he is too much a believer in motion pictures to ruin them by giving vaudeville. Mr. Berkson has been approached by some of his patrons who advised him to put on a vaudeville act. To thee persons Mr. Berkson advised a visit to his neighbors, where they could see all the cheap vaudeville they cared to. Have they gone there? It is doubtful, as they are still seen in the crowds waiting in front of the Roseland Theater for a chance to see good pictures and hear some good and appropraite music.

Mr. Berkson is very particular in the selection of his pictures; he wants the best and he shows them to the best advantage. He has a very good orchestra of five pieces following the pictures to the best of their ability, and everything is as clean and orderly as can be.

I have found that in general the ladies of Chicago are not so selfish as their Eastern sisters, yet I had to go to the Roseland Theater to find a large audience of ladies and not a single hat in sight.

The Roseland Theater is a well conducted house, which should be a model to many other houses; no noise, no such remarks so common in other moving picture theaters; in fact, the Roseland should be called "The Family Theater." It is a family theater. Mr. Faxon, the popular singer, has been over two years with the present management; the operator himself claims the same long service, while the cashier and ushers have just as good records.

The Roseland Theater can seat 500 persons, has a well inclined floor and, although simple in decoration, is very tasteful, well lighted and ventilated, a specimen of cleanliness and good order.

A Chicago paper publishes an item to the effect that the Mayor of Wilkesbarre, Pa., refuses to allow the moving picture shows to open on Sunday.

This Sunday question is a bone of contention with no final solution in sight. We cannot blame the Mayor of Wilkesbarre, as his views are endorsed by manufacturers, even exhibitors of more sober judgment. Moving picture shows should be allowed to run on Sunday and they would be allowed to do so if we had less greedy exhibitors in our ranks. On the plea of "sacred concerts," the Mayor answered: "The first thing we know, you would have your pianos going and maybe you might put on a vaudeville stunt." He is right.

If the exhibitors wanted to show only good clean pictures on Sundays, with decent appropriate music, the shows would be allowed to run, but then Jones, jealous of Smith, would introduce a leg show to draw the crowd or he would order his pianist to play any old ragtime or erratic music for the sake of making some noise.

The greedy exhibitors have done much harm to the business, have ruined many showmen, have cut their own throats and are really the cause of all the drastic measures taken by the different municipalities and the fight of the clergy against motion pictures.

The Mirror Screen.

The Mirror Screen was demonstrated last Friday at Mr. Geo. Kleine's offices, where the full merits of the new invention were appreciated by an audience of persons connected with the moving pictures for a number of years. The first

MR. FRED BARTHOLMOE.

Mirror Screen in Chicago was placed last Saturday in the handsome Garfield Theater, Fifty-fifth and Halstead streets, and Saturday evening Mr. Fred. Bartholmoe, the owner of the theater, was constantly congratulated by his numerous patrons, who were more than delighted with the effects of the pictures on the Mirror Screen. The congratulations were so numerous and genuine that the good news traveled quickly and on Sunday, when I called to see the new screen, Mr. Bartholmoe had more than he could do to handle a great crowd of visitors, anxious to see good pictures as they should be shown.

Mr. Bartholmoe is more than satisfied with his investment and declares in the most emphatic manner that he would not part with his new Mirror Screen. It was amusing to be seated in the audience and to listen to the very favorable comments made by the patrons of the theater, all praising the management for the constant improvements and showing plainly that our public of to-day is not running after highly sensational pictures, but can appreciate and enjoy good work.

The Selig Polyscope Company in ordering a Mirror Screen for their exhibition room, show that they are awake to all new improvements and recognize that the new Mirror Screen can enhance the beauty of their well known productions.

The second Mirror Screen placed in a Chicago theater was exhibited for the first time on Sunday evening at the Elite Theater, Forty-seventh street and Indiana avenue, a fine house, simple but extremely tasteful in decoration.

There also the Mirror Screen was a great revelation and at the genuine satisfaction expressed by his patrons, Mr. N. Nasser, the owner of the theater, was delighted with his purchase. A set of slides by Simpson, of New York, showed what the Mirror Screen could do to bring out the colors and details. As soon as the Mirror Screen is known in this neighborhood, we can predict crowded houses for this enterprising young exhibitor.

Mr. Harry F. Bryan, representing the Mirror Screen, is negotiating a number of other deals and hopes to soon have more screens in Chicago.

At the closing of this letter, a gentleman who visited the Pastime Theater, on Madison street, on Monday evening, reports that the pianist ruined the Biograph production, "The Converts," by playing noisy ragtime music, even in the scenes where the young man and the converted girl are seen preaching on the street corners. This gentleman asked me if the attention of the managers should not be called to the question of appropriate music. My answer is that we have done much on this line, but we cannot force the managers to run the shows to please a decent class of spectators when they want to cater to a certain element who go to moving picture shows to have a gay time and applaud vulgarities. The managers should know, and many of them do know, that the great majority of their patrons have better taste. J.M.B.

"In Old California" (Biograph).—A strongly dramatic story with the picturesque background of California in 1822 as a setting. It is well acted and the dramatic situations are developed with intelligence and ability, while the photographic quality is beyond criticism. The story is based upon a romantic marriage, with a deplorable state of affairs in later years as a result of the husband's drunkenness. The son proves quite as much of an ingrate as his father, but to spare the mother the governor decorates the boy and sends him to his mother as she is dying. It is a dramatic scene, worked out with close attention to details, and characteristic of the excellent work always done by this company. Then comes the climax, when the decorations are torn from the young man's breast and he is thrown into prison to receive just punishment for his crimes. The picturesque setting adds to the beauty of the picture and is therefore a welcome addition to the film.

"Across the Plains" (Selig).—A picture of the plains, made on the plains and full of the life of that interesting region. It is difficult, perhaps, to offer any helpful criticism of a picture like this. A considerable proportion of its interest will naturally depend upon the point of view selected by the operator of the camera. In this instance the operator did his work well and there is little to be said against his choice. The picture breathes the spirit of the plains and illustrates graphically the life which is fast passing away. Such films not only interest those who see them, but they preserve in intelligible form scenes which ultimately will be only memories.

"Hearts Are Trumps" (Lubin).—A story told amid scenes of tropical luxuriance. There is some great riding on spirited horses, and the story contains so much romance that it never loses its human interest. The selection of the setting was particularly happy and the acting is done with a fidelity to details which makes it one of the best the firm has ever sent out. It pictures a locality unfamiliar to a majority of those who see it and this will add greatly to its interest and value.

"His First Valentine" (Edison).—While this picture is a comedy to those who see it one can scarcely refrain from sympathizing with the young man whose affections are centered upon the pretty school teacher and who undertakes to express his feelings by procuring a valentine and sending it to her. The scene is laid in California in the old stage coaching days when holdups were not an uncommon experience of travelers. Then comes a rattling good fight with the outlaws, which represents the ardent lover possessed of but one thought, getting the valentine to the teacher upon the right day. This he dramatically accomplishes, though severely wounded. The ending is happy enough to compensate for any difficulties which may have preceded. The scenery is picturesque, the acting is sympathetic and there is the usual clear photography to help out. The picture should prove interesting.

"Love Drops" (Edison).—A comedy representing the effect upon a grouchy father, who persistently said no, when when a box of love drops intended for the daughter falls into his hands and he partakes of them more or less copiously. The ending shows the satisfactory result after the sullen grouch has been transformed into a laughing, happy optimist. These love drops were indeed powerful factors. The picture works it out in a very amusing and sympathetic way, and the photographic quality is clear and good.

"The Robber Baron" (Kalem.)—The first picture from this firm's newly established New York studio, and if this is an indication of those to follow there will be no question of popularity. While there may be places where the machinery did not work smoothly, in the main it is a satisfactory product and will rank with other studio products. It is a melodramatic story of swashbuckling days in old England, with reproductions of costumes and scenery graphically accomplished. While there is a good deal of ferocity exhibited, which is inseparable from the subject, a vein of comedy runs through it which adds greatly to its attractions. The ending is happy, and this has an influence in making the film interesting. The company has no reason to feel ashamed of its first studio attempt and further issues will be awaited with interest.

"Cure for Timidity" (Pathe).—A comedy which might afford a hint of surcease from persecution of other henpecked husbands. The magic transformation, after taking one dose of the courage inspiring compound, is graphically illustrated by the change in affairs at home.

"Seaside Flirtation" (Pathe).—A picture detailing the adventures of a seaside flirt, introducing humorous and lively scenes. It has all the qualities with which a picture of this character is endowed.

"Conscience" (Vitagraph).—A powerful dramatic picture, representing what conscience sometimes does. The scene is laid in old Venice, and all the picturesque and artistic surroundings of that city are graphically reproduced. A poor baker boy is tortured until he confesses to a murder he never committed. When he comes up for trial, one of his judges is the real murderer and his conscience compels him to confess the crime. It is a powerful dramatic film, filled with situations which depict the struggle which may go on in the human heart and mind. The players have imbibed the spirit so thoroughly that they make it seem real. The scenes are fascinating, even the gruesome suggestiveness of the torture chamber holding the attention closely. The picture will be popular because of its dramatic situations and the excellent acting.

"The Fence on the Bar Z Ranch" (Essanay).—With a thrilling exhibition of Western life and character the Essanay people offer what is probably one of the best Western films they have ever put out. There is the spirit of daring, exhibitions of bravery and sufficient pathos to balance the dramatic features and keep the onlooker interested from beginning to end. Not a weak point appears in the acting, and the development of the story is worked out so cleverly that the interest grows. Always the love story which runs through these films adds to their interest, and always the Essanay people make it a prominent feature of their pictures. There is plenty of life and excitement and pathos to maintain the interest at a high level.

"Rabelias' Joke" (Gaumont).—A humorous skit worked out with all the careful attention to details which characterizes the work of this house.

"Pirate Airship" (Gaumont).—Here is a comedy which represents what might be the result of an airship that ran amuck as a pirate. The situations are comical and are well worked out. Some excellent effects are noted through the picture and the end is quite as funny as the scenes presented while the film runs.

"Tale of a Tenement" (Pathe).—A pretty little story, played with sufficient sympathy to develop all its possibilities. It carries with it a tender love story, more so than the average, and many sentimental thoughts will gather as one sees the picture run. When the young man lays his flowers on the child's bier and thereby wins a wife, one unconsciously heartily commends the girl's choice. It is an especially attractive film, filled with sentiment and appreciation of the dramatic possibilities of the theme.

"Sporty Dad" (Pathe).—When a father and two sons are represented as amirers of the same girl the possibilities for humorous complications can, perhaps, be imagined. Yet here is seen just such a situation worked out with all the care and attention to details which characterize most of the Pathe products. The climax, when three heads emerge from as many hiding places and mutual recognition occurs, is extremely funny and emphasizes the innumerable complications which may arise.

"The Converts" (Biograph).—A deeply religious picture, depicting in a very dramatic way the power an uttered word may exert, even though spoken by false lips. There is a species of horror induced by this picture because it blasphemes sacred things, more, perhaps, by suggestion than by direct word or act, yet none the less real and none the less repulsive. That one was saved and in turn was the means of extending grace to the blasphemer is the dramatic working out of the story. One feels that it is right for these two souls to come together, as they do eventually, and can but rejoice in the consummation of a story destined to exert a powerful influence upon those who see the film. The story, with its masterful presentation, is a strong sermon and vividly reveals the power of religion to reclaim even the most profligate.

"Mamma's Angel Child" (Lubin).—The mischievous children who appear in the Lubin films never fail to make a hit. Here is one of them in a new series of capers which raise many laughs and show a good many novelties in the course of the picture. The climax is novel, too, making it a very satisfactory film in every way.

"The Dawn of Freedom" (Selig).—This house has made a reputation for its war pictures. They are all worked out with care, skill and patience. In this instance a remarkably interesting story is told in such a straightforward way that it interests everyone, while the dramatic incidents follow each other in rapid succession. And when it is finished he who has seen it will agree that he has acquired a stronger appreciation of this important thing called freedom.

"The Blunderer" (Lubin).—The story of a country lad sent to a city uncle to acquire polish. His city residence is brief, but eventful, and shortly he is discovered back home performing the menial farm duties from which he had been temporarily released.

"Crowded Hotel" (Selig).—A comedy which will keep any audience in extremely good humor from beginning to end. It is as laughable as anything this firm has put out lately and is worked out with such close attention to the details necessary that the interest is maintained throughout.

"Uncle's Money" (Pathe).—A comedy based upon a complication suggested in the title and creating no end of amusement while the picture is running. These pictures which depict the eagerness with which heirs go looking for a relative's money never fail to amuse.

"Tobacco Culture" (Pathe).—An industrial picture illustrating a most important subject, and one which deserves adequate illustration. In this film, as in many other industrial subjects from the same house, the subject is made so plain that it is easily understood. In short, it performs an important office, it instructs even while it amuses.

"The Saraband Dance" (Gaumont).—A mystical picture which keeps the audience interest in not only enjoying the scenes as they flow, but in wondering what is coming next. The mystical features are well worked out and the entire film is well worth placing on any program.

"In the Shadow of the Cliffs" (Gaumont).—A strongly dramatic film, carrying with it much eautiful and picturesque scenery. Some of its scenic features add materially to the film and largely increase its attractiveness. The dramatic possibilities are strongly developed and each actor gets the most out of his or her part. The photography is clear, even where difficult subjects are included.

"Fruit Growing in the Grand Valley, Colorado" (Edison).—An industrial film, illustrating the marvelous results of irrigation. This picture will be an educator of an unusually valuable type. The East knows practically nothing of irrigation, but after the many thousands who will see this picture are made acquainted with its accomplishments, it is safe to say that they will favor any project of that character. In addition to this all the operations of fruit growing on a large scale are illustrated. A special trip was made by the operator to Grand Valley to secure this picture, and the results from every standpoint justified the effort. The film is commended to those who are endeavoring to spread the irrigation propaganda for the assistance it will be to them.

"A Mountain Blizzard" (Edison).—A picture evidently based upon one of Mark Twain's famous scenes in "Roughing It," where the three travelers, lost in the snow, renounce their controlling vices, cards, tobacco and whiskey. The snow seems real enough, and the efforts to start a fire follow closely the description in the book. And then, when they awake and find themselves once more alive, each returns to his pet vice, and it is thus they meet. The picture is well worked out, and those who enjoyed the story when it was first printed will enjoy this the more.

"The Inventor's Model" (Essanay).—A dramatic picture based upon the supposition that an unprincipled scoundrel steals an old man's invention and is making a fortune out of it when he is detected and punished through his stenographer, whose testimony determines the case in court. There are a number of dramatic scenes. One of the best is where the old couple are seen on the witness stand. Like all good stories, its ending is happy, leaving the audience satisfied with the punishment of the scoundrel and the return of the ill-gotten gains to the inventor.

"Method in His Madness" (Essanay).—A bit of comedy, representing two tramps working a trick of having a fit before a saloon for the purpose of securing whiskey. Their little scheme works for a time, but is discovered and they get seltzer in place of whiskey as a cure for their last fit.

"The Seminole's Trust" (Kalem).—An Indian picture that will appeal strongly to the large number who believe that Indians have honor and can be faithful to their trust. It is a thrilling picture and the chase of the desperado is a stirring series of scenes. The title of a particular scene, "The Haunting of Fear," is perhaps sufficient explanation of its character. The acting is so good that it carries an intensity of feeling with it which convinces one that it is almost real. The firm is to be congratulated upon producing such an excellent film and surely the many thousands who see it and enjoy it will welcome it as an addition to their pleasure.

"A Trip Along the Rhine" (Urban).—No better outdoor picture has ever been made by this firm than this one, depicting some of the most picturesque scenery along Europe's most famous river. The Urban operators understand the selection of viewpoints and the reproduction of nature's beauties which conveys the impression that the pictures approach reality. One can obtain an accurate impression of the beauty of the Rhine by seeing this picture, hence it not only amuses, but instructs by bringing the scenery of that marvelous region here where the veriest stay-at-home can see it.

"Bull Fight in Mexico" (Pathe).—A reproduction of a bull fight in which an American cowboy fights Mexico's most famous bull barehanded and escapes with his life. The picture has thrilling moments and there is a certain degree of fascination about it which cannot be resisted, even though one may not exactly like the picture as a whole. For instance, one does feel something of pride to discover a man powerful enough and courageous enough to conquer a bull barehanded. The photography is satisfactorily done and the psychological moments were well selected.

INDEPENDENT FILMS

"Life in the Next Century" (Lux).—An amusing but imaginative picture, representing what may occur in the blissful future, after invention and science have removed all necessity of individuals doing anything for themselves. It is amusing and it arouses a more or less interesting series of suggestions, but one must admit that it eventually gives way to a sense of boredom. It shows that, after all, healthy individuals prefer to perform some of the necessary operations of living themselves.

"The Two Brothers" (Lux).—A repetition of the old story of an old man giving his money to an ungrateful son and turning the other out of doors. Compensation comes, however, and the old man, blind and alone, is turned out in the street. One of the most effective scenes in the play is where the blind man staggers across the street, amid the mixture of traffic, and across the railroad track just ahead of an express. There is a touching scene when the little girl takes the old man home and the recognition of the old man follows. The happy ending in some degree compensates for the bitterness which appears in the first part of the picture.

"A Daughter's Devotion" (Nestor).—A dramatic story detailing the devotion of a daughter in helping her father. The acting is fair and there is a considerable degree of interest attaching to this development of a somewhat old theme. Nevertheless, a daughter's devotion is always a subject well worth depicting and the public is never tired of seeing it.

"Old Maid and Bonehead" (Nestor).—Bonehead, who has made a number of hits, reappears in this picture, and his experiences with the old maid are funny enough to please the most exacting demands.

"The Shepherdess" (Ambrosio).—A beautifully told story of a girl who would give her life for the man she loves. There are heights of dramatic power in it which will appeal to almost everyone. The scenery is remarkably picturesque and beautiful and the acting is sympathetic and powerful. Photographically the picture is exceedingly well done. It is a satisfactory film and represents the best elements of motion picture production.

"Rose of the Ranch" (Bison).—A dramatic portrayal of scenes in Old Mexico, graphically reproduced, ending with a pretty romance sympathetically acted. The Bison Company's success in pictures of this character is already well known, and this picture, in entirely new surroundings, will add to their reputation.

"Fatal Imprudence" (Ambrosio).—A film with much dramatic interest, centering about the fact that when one does something which isn't quite right the innocent often suffer with the guilty, or instead of them. This point, which, by the way, is dramatic, is emphasized and may be considered as conveying a moral well worth while. The players have taken good care of the dramatic elements of the picture and the photographer has risen to the occasion.

"They Have Vanished My Wife" (Ambrosio).—A comedy which is a veritable laugh producer. The comical situations resulting from the antics of a gentleman whose wife has apparently vanished are sufficient to keep everyone in good humor and leave them wishing for more.

"The Broken Oath" (Imp).—A powerful melodrama which deals in a graphic way with a young man, his sweetheart and a secret society in which he held membership. The action is so strong that it keeps one interested and guessing as long as the film runs. To break a secret society oath requires a good deal of nerve, and there are certain situations connected with a sweetheart which also require nerve. Where these two come together it is quite likely to be doubly interesting. Then, too, there are the Imp actors to perform their parts so sympathetically that one takes pleasure in watching them intently to follow all the little details. This picture is certain to prove popular, and everyone will appreciate its merits after the picture has been seen. The photography is an improvement on some previous Imp releases, but it could be made better in some places now.

"The Time Lock Safe" (Imp).—One hardly knows what to say about this picture. Here is someone running around getting safe blowers to open a safe for the recovery of a child, and the latter is discovered in a basket. Probably the one who is supposed to have performed this felt quite as angry as he looked. And one can sympathize with him. The play is well acted and the sudden turn of events adds a piquancy which makes it all the more catchy. In reality it is what it promises to be, a highly emotional drama turned into a screaming farce.

"Aspirants to the Hand of Helen" (Eclair).—A novel test of the worthiness of a young man as a husband. Out of three the maiden chooses one who seems most familiar with housekeeping duties. Some of the scenes are distinctly humorous, and there is a thread of fun running through it all which adds much to the interest and keeps the audience in good humor.

"For His Sister's Honor" (Bison).—A dramatic picture which represents a brother confessing to a theft committed by his sister, then being confronted with the accusation years after. Fortunately he is able to prove his innocence to his wife and thus save a tragedy. The acting is satisfactory and in most instances the photography is clear.

"War Time Pals" (Powers Picture Play).—A war story which will stir the emotions, since it depicts the kindness and helpfulness which are inseparable from true friendship. There are dramatic moments which will remain in one's memory, and there are incidents which will stand out clear and distinctly even after the main portion of the picture is forgotten. The recognition of the pals and the warmhearted way the successful one takes to testify to his affection are reassuring to those who may have been influenced to believe that friendship is a matter of dollars. Acting and photography are both worthy of the theme.

"The Actor's Children" (Thanhouser).—Here is a picture which will interest by its fidelity to life and thrill with its appeal to the emotions. There is pathos, there is humor. Love and hate, the two most powerful passions of the human soul, are clearly depicted. In some respects this picture appeals even more strongly than the average which undertakes to illustrate those emotions which the principal controlling agencies in human life. The acting seems convincing and there is an evident comprehension on the part of the actors which adds to the film's attractiveness. The firm is to be congratulated upon thus developing a subject and then reproducing it with adequate photographic work.

COMING HEADLINER.

At Mr. Geo. Kleine's offices I was shown an advance copy of "The Fall of Babylon" and the releases of the coming week.

To the best of my knowledge, "The Fall of Babylon" is the grandest biblical subject ever produced in moving pictures. In this remarkable film we can see the master hand of Mr. Gaumont for details and accuracy.

All the characters are well studied and this film is perhaps the first production in which the principal character does not assume these languishing expressions shown in other films. Daniel is a man of God, he is pious and appears manly, he does not cry all the time, does not give the sad impression that the work of God is a hard and sad task to perform, he is firm, dignified and does not appear like a discouraged servant. Belshazzar, Cyrus, in fact all the other characters, are as good; the costumes and details are correct to the times.

The acting is as perfect as can be wished for, while the photography is of the highest quality and the tinting offers some of the best and softest shades ever shown on a screen.

A few more films of this character and we will have the churches adopting motion pictures, as the pastors will have no more reason to say: "Not correct to the Bible or the times."

We must have the churches, schools and other educational bodies to help us and to make such productions profitable to the manufacturers, as we cannot depend on the exhibitors, who refuse to show the same film two or more days in succession.

Mr. Gaumont knows how to make the most of a very simple story. "Little Jack's Letter" is a very simple scenario, a scenario that would have been rejected by most of the manufacturers as void of any special feature. Yet Mr. Gaumont makes you feel that, after all, the world is not so bad and that if boys will be boys they are not devoid of filial sentiments. It is indeed a very impressive picture.

"In the Shadow of the Cliffs" is another very simple story, a story in which the producers show the intelligence and faithfulness of a dumb animal—the dog—instead of putting forth their effects to show the brutality of the smugglers, etc. Mr. Gaumont makes a success of the simplest scenario because he knows how to produce, he knows how far he can go, he knows how to sustain the interest, he knows and studies the details, while some producers make a failure of the very best scenarios.

I was surprised to see two scenic films in the coming releases, "In the Foothills of Savoy" and "A Trip Along the Rhine," but some exhibitors who were present at this advance exhibition told me that the public wanted some scenic and educational pictures. This also was confirmed to me the very same evening, while in the company of a prominent Independent renter. He told me that many of his patrons wanted one scenic and one educational in every film shipment.

This is certainly a good sign and another bad blow at the exhibitors who claim that they cannot run a show without vaudeville.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

"The Merry Widow" of current release will certainly prove that she is not only a taking widow but a sure enough winner of laughs and merriment, an excellent tonic for a disordered liver and a chaser for the "blues." On April 16th "The Merry Widow Takes Another Partner" and we will keep on smiling just the same. Get in on the smiles.

"The Man Hunter" appears in the latter part of April. A dramatic innovation and yet withal a realism of actual life in the unfrequented forests and fastnesses of upper Canada, palpitating with the red blood of humanity and the romance of adventure. A story that holds the attention with spellbound expectancy. If you want to do the right thing by your people, "do it now." Make a note of "this marvel of life in the untrammeled realms of nature."

Just a word to refresh your memory: "Elektra," the great Grecian tragedy, April 8; "The Conqueror," a homespun drama of a wayward son's redemption of himself and the influences of home, sweet home, on April 9; and another beautiful emotional drama with a Dickensonian tinge, "The Call of the Heart," on April 15.

The dramatic production, "St. Elmo," to be released April 23, is a sparkling gem in a surrounding of the most brilliant settings. A story of true love blasted by insincerity and deception and redeemed by the purity and sterling worth of a noble woman, who proves that the frailty and weakness of woman is individual and not general. A word to the wise is sufficient. Get wise. Be wise. Take advantage of this timely announcement and secure "St. Elmo" for the benefit of your trade.

"MOVING PICTURE GODS AND GODDESSES."

"Matinee" and "Johnnie" idols are very common stage attractions to a certain species of the genus homo who frequent the theater; the moving picture gods and goddesses are of recent discovery. We can understand how a person can "fall in love" with the living and attractive presence of an actor or actress, but it is incomprehensible how men and women will "fall in love" with moving picture actors as seen on the screen, yet it is a fact attested and established by the number of requests and letters we receive from persons inquiring the names of and soliciting introductions to Vitagraph leading men and women.

It also proves that the acting as well as their personalities must be pretty much the real thing. There is no doubt that frequenters of moving picture exhibitions recognize our stars and become interested, if not infatuated, with their work, and look for their appearance in the Vitagraph pictures. These facts, as well as other reasons, make us very careful in the engagement of only the highest order of talent in the production of our pictures.

G. M. Anderson, the Essanay's Western producer, writes that he is preparing for a big Western drama, one of the most sensational films ever released. We have read the manuscript, and if the film is as good as the story, this picture should prove one of the greatest Western pictures ever released.

PATHE NOTES.

Not the least interesting of the recent flood in Paris are the pictures shown on this page of Pathe Freres factory at Joinville le Pont, France. This is one of the largest of the Pathe factories, and is situated on the banks of the Marne River, a tributary to the Seine. The waters of the Marne under ordinary circumstances are some ten feet below the river bank on which the factory is built, and the water in the picture is in most places some four feet deep, making the total rise of about fourteen feet at this point.

The factory at Joinville employes about 1,000 workmen, and consists of large machine shops where the "Pathe Professionals" are made, a big carpentry department, developing, printing, coloring, verifying, inspection and shipping departments. The fact that the 23 buildings in this plant were all made of stone or concrete, saved the company many thousands of dollars during the inundation. Joinville is near Paris and suffered about as greatly from the flood, the workmen who live in the vicinity being forced either to live in the second story of their houses or abandon them altogether and take to the higher ground, as many were compelled to do. Work in the factory at Joinville was suspended for several days, but fortunately the factories at Vincennes and Montreuil sous Bois and at Paris were all able to keep running to their full capacity, although many of the operators were compelled to make part of their journey to the factories in boats.

Many amusing incidents occurred at the Joinville plant during the flood. Among others there is the story of the watch dog, a pet of the engineer's, which spent most of its time in the engine room. Of course as the waters rose day by day, the employees were compelled to abandon their work and all the fires in the boiler room were put out. When the engineer left his post in a boat he endeavored to coax the dog to accompany him. Nothing doing, "Francois" refused to leave his post, seeming to realize that with all the men away it was beneath his royal dignity to quit his important function as watchman. Several days later, when some of the men had secured boats and rowed and paddled around the plant, they heard mournful howls from the boiler room, and arriving there, they found the water to the top of the boilers, and on top, with his foot on the safety valve, sat Francois cold and hungry, and with his French tail wagging an excited welcome, while beside him, evidently under his kindly protection, sat his old enemy, the office cat. How the cat got from the office to the boiler room nobody knows, but there she sat and since the flood Francois and Nanon have been the best of friends, indeed almost inseparable. Francois is well known from the Pathe film, "Oh! You Doggie."

Max Linder, the famous comedian who has won such favor in the eyes of the American moving picture goers, and who spends most of his leisure time at the Joinville factory, was one of the last to leave the plant and waded three-quarters of a mile through water up to his waist when he left the factory. Could the American audiences have seen Max in this predicament it would have probably convulsed them with laughter, and as Max himself remarked, "Si cela continue, nous serons obligés de jouer en coustume de bain!" ("If this keeps on, we will have to play our parts in bathing suits!")

A rather remarkable picture was taken by Pathe Freres on February 26 at Lake Ronkonkoma, when a picture was made of Mr. Nat Roe's 120-horsepower motor iceboat, and Mr. Van Anden's aero iceboat. These two boats are widely different in design, though both afford fine Winter sport. Roe's motor boat is the fastest boat in the world, making as high as 120 miles an hour. Its great advantage over ordinary iceboats is that it does not need to wait for wind, and when it comes upon a break in the ice of two or three hundred feet, it can cross it with scarcely any diminution of speed. Riding with Mr. Roe is wild sport, as the writer knows, and jumping airholes has the Coney Island shoot the chutes beaten to a frazzle. Good pictures were obtained of both Roe and Van Anden, jumping airholes in the ice, the former traveling at the rate of 90 miles an hour. This picture will be released in the near future and should make a strong appeal to every lover of good sport.

Another film d'art which will be enthusiastically received by every audience, is to be released soon, under the title, "The Duchess de Langeais." This is a story of a beautiful but coquettish woman, who held her little court of lovers at the time when Ferdinand VII. was King of Spain. The Duchess was a French woman whose pride was piqued by the fact that the famous General de Meyran failed to be captivated by her charms. She invites him to her home for a little tete-a-tete. This invitation the General accepts and there falls deeply in love with the fickle young lady. As he is declaring his affection, the Duchess's friends, who have been without, fling wide the door and catch the General on his knees. Deeply wounded and angered, he withdraws, but the Duchess de Langeais, after playing so wantonly with edged tools, finds that she herself has fallen deeply in love with the General. She asks his pardon, but is sternly refused by the obdurate soldier, and thereafter she disappears from Paris life. Five years later, General de Meyran receives a commission from Ferdinand VII. of Spain, and while establishing order in Formentera he visits the Convent of the Order of the Carmelite Nuns. While passing through the chapel, he recognizes in the garb of a nun his former love, the Duchess de Langeais. The recognition is mutual, and the Duchess flees to her cell.

That night the General, with two friends, resolves to take her by force from the convent, and having forced an entrance they wander along the quiet passage until they find the door marked with the name which the Duchess has adopted at the time of her taking the veil. They enter, alas, too late, the excitement of seeing her lover in such a place, after five years of separation, has proved too much for the Duchess and she has died, and here in the lonely cell they find her body laid upon a rude bier, with the dim light of candles flickering on her pallid face. The Mother Superior now enters and sternly orders them to retire, which they do, after the General has imprinted his first and last kiss on the cold lips of his dead love. This play is adapted from the widely read story by Honore de Balzac.

The approaching release of "Cleopatra" is a stupendous production, staged by M. Zecca in the Pathe studios, France. The cost of the stage setting, costumes and scenery was enormous, and the production bids fair to be one of the most pronounced successes which Pathe Freres have released. The beauty of the scenery, which includes some water views is striking, and the characters in this great tragedy have been played with consumate skill by some of the leading players in France. A notable incident in the production is the scene of the death of the messenger who bears to Cleopatra the ill news of Antony's defeat and who, as you all know, was poisoned by Cleopatra for being the bearer of such bad news. The part of the messenger is played by Mlle. Napierkowska, of the Opera, and her work is extremely clever. Cleopatra and Antony are both parts which provide an opportunity for the greatest play of feeling, and this opportunity is realized and properly grasped by Mad'aline Roche, who proves herself a great tragedienne in the part of the powerful and cruel queen.

"The Polar Bear Hunt in the Arctic Seas," to be released on Monday, March 28, by Pathe Freres, is a marvelous picture in many respects. This picture is not a posed affair but is an actual scene of an actual hunt. The view in which the long boat is seen leaving the steamer shows two polar bears, at a great distance from the camera, playing around on an iceberg. The exciting chase which follows, in which the hunters are compelled to drag their boat across the ice and row it through the open water, pursuing the bears who have taken fright and are doing their best to get away, is most interesting. These clumsy animals are evidently very agile and are perfectly wonderful swimmers; crossing one ice-floe after another, they take to the water with tremendous speed and a great splash. The final scene, in which one of the hunters is within a few feet of what is supposed to be a dead bear, is very exciting, as Mr. Bear stands up on his hind legs and shows fight. The shot at short range and the effect is startling in the extreme.

On March 28, Pathe will release a delightful comedy, full of vital humor and played with great gusto by Max Linder, the famous comedian who for years has made such a hit all over America in the Red Rooster films. This comedy is really funny, and shows the trials of poor Max, learning to juggle three balls in order that he may win his lady-love, who has told him that she never would marry any man who cold not accomplish this delicate feat. This film is sure to be very well received.

EDISON NOTES.

A drama entitled "The Suitcase Mystery," by Edward W. Townsend, is the release of the 25th. In a novel and lucid manner Mr. Townsend has built up a story upon the similarity of two suitcases, one belonging to the paymaster of a large contracting concern, and the other to a young draftsman, who, having lost his position because of a strike in the factory in which he is employed, is returning home. Crossing the street, he is run down by the paymaster's automobile, and in the confusion attendant upon the accident the two suitcases are exchanged, to the subsequent amazement of the one and the discomfiture of the other. The temptation to retain the money is strong upon the young draftsman, but his mother's counsel prevailing, he returns the suitcase to the police station, to which the draftsman has also repaired under the custody of police, doubt having been cast upon his story by his employer. Here the draftsman meets the paymaster's sister, who, as luck would have it, had met him after the automobile accident and bound his wounded hand with her handkerchief. The situation is cleared, and the young fellow is given employment by the contractor himself, who recognizes in the mother of the youth the widow of a friend of his younger days. The logical ending of the story is unfolded in subsequent scenes, which are enlivened by bright comedy touches.

"Bradford's Claim," the release of March 29, is an intensely dramatic story in which Don Fulano, the world's greatest living educated horse, performs feats of almost human intelligence. A thrilling climax is reached in this story when the heroine, surrounded on all sides by pursuing desperadoes, finds herself near the edge of a cliff twenty feet above the river. Hesitating but a moment she urges her horse to the leap, which he takes in magnificent style, horse and rider plunging into the stream and gaining the opposite shore to the chagrin of their pursuers. The leap of the horse in this scene was a most daring piece of work, both narrowly escaping injury through a portion of the bank giving way beneath the horse's hoofs as he was about to spring from the cliff. "Bradford's Claim" will hold the attention of an audience from the beginning to end of the film.

"Michael Strogoff," Jules Verne's absorbing story of the thrilling adventures of the Czar's courier on his secret mission, will be released April 1. Those who have read the book will realize the many opportunities it affords for unusually strong dramatic situations. No effort has been spared to make this production worthy in every respect of the story, and it is promised that in respect to photography, stage settings and acting the film will measure fully up to the Edison standard.

"Sandy the Substitute," especially arranged for Edison production by Roy Norton, the author of the well known "Whistling Sandy" stories, is slated for release on April the 8th. The character of "Whistling Sandy" has appeared fore extensively during the last five years in such magazines as Harper's, Century, Everybody's and the Cosmopolitan than probably any other in faction or history. The heroic conduct of the quaint hero under a crucial test is the subject of the first film of the series, and it is said that the possibilities of the story have been fully grasped in its visualization, the characters of "Sandy" Smith and the outlaw being interpreted with fine dramatic appreciation of the roles.

Richard Harding Davis' "Her First Appearance," a special adaptation of his famous story by the author, is to be released February 15. For the interpretation of this play a special cast was engaged, and the utmost care taken in the costuming and stage settings. It is said to be played with a simplicity and fidelity which makes the story tremendously convincing and will place it among the film classics of the year.

ESSANAY NOTES.

The most portentious woodland setting ever constructed within a moving picture studio was erected in the Essanay Company's studio last week. The enormity of the scene can be imagined when it is understood that it occupied nearly half the entire studio floor, that numbers of extra workmen had worked for several weeks on the scene and that it required practically a week to set it. Picture taking at the Essanay plant during the week was interrupted during the construction of the set, while the scenic artists and carpenter's crews and extra workmen labored tirelessly in order to finish within the week.

The scene represents a section of a South American rubber plantation, twenty-five or more immense tree trunks, some measuring 3 feet in diameter and towering upward 18 or 20 feet, were first stood on ends and made fast to the floor. Sand, earth and sod were then packed about the bases of the tree logs. At the cost of several hundred dollars, numerous rare tropical plants, palms, ferns and small shrubbery were procured and made a neat and realistic underbrush for the setting. Vines and tree moss, with the foliage of the rubber tree, partially hid the tree trunks. A hut, constructed of saplings and corn stalks, was placed in the foreground, with the utensils for the smoking of the para rubber milk.

The entire setting represents three scenes, showing the tapping of the rubber trees for the milk, another of the native workmen carrying the milk to the hut where it is smoked and the third and last scene of the process of smoking the rubber milk to preserve and make hard for shipping.

The most noteworthy fact about the big set is that it was entirely natural, barring one item. Only the foliage of the rubber trees was artificial.

Exhibitors have made many inquiries lately if the Essanay Company furnish exhibitors lobby photos of their principal actors. The Essanay Company desire to state that while at present they have no organized stock company, contracts are now being signed by a number of actors who are well known in theatrical circles, with a view to organizing a very strong and capable stock company. These people have been chosen from the very best acting talent obtainable and will be in the Essanay employ immediately their present season's contracts expire.

and brushed into the midst of the frantic cattle, when her screams attracted the attention of some of the picture actors close at hand. The first man to the gate of the corral leaped the fence and ran in among the cattle. He succeeded in getting the little girl to safety on the other side of the fence, but when he was gently lifted over he was found to be severely bruised and cut and almost unconscious. If you think it is not heroic to go strolling among fifty or sixty frantic Texas steers, try it. You will soon change your opinion.

MELIES NOTES.

The Melies Manufacturing Company with their new equipment are producing a series of Western pictures unsurpassed in detail and scenery. There is a reason: In the southern part of Texas and on the Mexican border their stock company of actors, especially selected for these plays, are doing the work right in the open with all the natural settings and local characters at their command. The releases of the Melies films will be resumed on Thursday, March 31, and every Thursday thereafter.

People may have seen moving pictures of the 'Wild West" taken in "Hohokus" or some other irrelevant place and they haven't seen the wild West at all. If you want to show them the real, genuine article of the wild and woolly; the native cowboy and rancheros, with chaperajos, sombreros and lariat; wild Indians in war paint and feathers, wait for these two "record busters" from Texas:

On Thursday, March 31—"Cyclone Pete in Matrimony,' a Western comedy of a cowboy with the marrying fever and wild Western bravado, who is completely tamed by his schoolmarm wife, whom he attempts to bullyrag. The matrimonial experiences of "Cyclone Pete" are framed in picturesque settings of wild Texas scenery and characters.

On Thursday, April 2—"Branding the Thief," a drama of startling situations and surprises in a story of Wetern life upon the plains, introducing Western horsemanship and skill and a touch of wild Western "snap" justice as administered to the cattle thief.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

A number of queries have reached the Thanhouser offices regarding the identity of the tots who played the lost youngsters in "The Actor's Children," and this paper is asked to help in the task of answering them. The little girl is Miss Orrilla Smith, of New York City, and the lad, Master Yale Boss, of the same place. Both have had a bit of stage training and considerable moving picture experience.

Who are the Thanhouser producers? We're glad to tell you. Barry O'Neil, late a Klaw & Erlanger producer, is one, and Lloyd B. Carlton, formerly with the Frohman forces, the other. They like the "picture game," but neither can get reconciled to the idea that every cop on the beat must receive his five-spot every time a street scene is "taken."

Lloyd F. Lonergan, who wrote "The Actor's Children," is "doing" most of the Thanhouser scenarios. The producers have found in him a writer who has grasped the "all-action" idea as applied to picture scenario writing, and possesses an ability to make the commonplace plot moving-picturesque. Mr. Lonergan is an editor on the "New York World."

The "old mansion" where resides St. Elmo in the Thanhouser subject of the same name, is old—really and truly. It dates from 1759. So let no keen critic condemn us for carelessness as to detail in this respect! Frank Crane portrays "St. Elmo" and Anna Rosemond "Agnes" in this effective picture.

IMP NOTES.

In the making of a scientific or industrial moving picture it is a foregone conclusion that no "faking" is indulged in. The particular value which educators and the public have attached to moving pictures of scientific subjects is the fact that the camera does not lie, and for this reason the moving pictures of medical subjects are looked forward to with great promise. How much more complimentary to the art of film making is it then, to learn that even in a "story picture" it has been found advisable to strive for scientific fidelity in portraying a surgical operation? In "Transfusion," the Imp release for March 28, such a scene is included. The director called in two physicians, who, besides supplying the appropriate surgical instruments, were given carte blanche in superintending the setting of the scene. The result is as perfect a bit of faithful detail as if the picture were taken in the operating theater of a modern hospital. First the arm of the blacksmith, whose blood is to be transfused into that of his injured sweetheart, is given an antiseptic wash, and bound in true surgical fashion, leaving the artery exposed through the bandage. Then a local anesthetic, probably cocaine, after which the artery is punctured and a silver tube inserted to receive the blood. The other end of the tube extends into the arm of the injured patient, and thus is the result obtained. Surgeons who have seen the picture pronounce this scene scientifically correct.

NEW PLANT OF THE LUBIN MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

"Perfect" is the most appropriate adjective to apply to the new plant of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, in Philadelphia, a cut of which is here shown, for it embodies the result of ripe experience that dates back to the inception of the motion picture.

Not alone has Mr. S. Lubin, one of the pioneers of motion pictures, advanced his own ideas, but a famous firm of architects, aided by a staff of photography experts and motion picture makers, developed and amplified those plans. No expense has been spared where the expenditure would add, however slightly, to the resulting perfection, and it would appear to be impossible to improve the plant.

The studio is a huge structure of brick, steel and glass, only the rear wall and 10 feet on each side being brick work. In this space are the tiers of dressing rooms, the offices of the directors and editorial staff. There will be a huge costume room, under the constant direction of an experienced theatrical costumer, and a property room that is far more elaborate than that of any theater.

In front of the dressing room tier stretches the studio proper, a clear floor space of 158 x 60 feet, with roof and seemingly ample provision has been made for the growth of the business. The precautions against dust and dirt seem to the uninitiated almost finical in their elaborateness.

All told, the new Lubin plant is easily entitled to be styled perfect from every point of view.

One of the pending Lubin releases is a buried treasure story made by the Southern contingent of the stock company on the very spot where the famous Blackbeard used to land his pirate crew fresh from an excursion on the Spanish Main. The company was working in Nassau, and the picture was made on Hog Island, across the harbor, Blackbeard's old lair.

The Southern section of the Lubin stock company returned from Nassau this week, brown as berries and enthusiastic over the trip. The field director, A. D. Hotaling, will presently take the company out again, this time a Western point being the objective, but before his departure the entire company will be utilized in some heavy productions.

three sides of glass. No beams or pillars interrupt the light or break the working space, and the entire building may be used for making one huge picture or cut up for small scenes. At either end is a huge door, through which may be taken a railroad train if desired and, in addition, two panels of the front are hinged to form the largest glass doors in the world, each being 22½ x 32 feet, giving an opening 45 feet in width. These doors weigh several tons apiece, but may be opened and closed by a lever operating the pneumatic mechanism. An interesting and unique system of heating will provide warmth in Winter, while the fierce heat of the sun's rays beating upon the huge area of glass will be tempered by a water curtain, a thin film of water flowing constantly over roof and sides.

A large tank is built into the floor of the studio, the water being heated in Winter by means of steam coil, and an original installation of lights renders the director independent of atmospheric conditions.

Between the studio and factory buildings the grounds are parted and contain a central heating and power plant and a garage for the big motor 'bus and the auxiliary motor equipment of touring cars. The power building will supply current and steam to all of the structures.

The taller of the factory buildings, a five-story structure, will house the executive and accounting staffs, the mechanical force and repair department, while the two-story building in the foreground will be devoted to the film product. This is 260 feet long and 60 feet wide and is so arranged that the film moves from the receiving to the shipping department through all the various processes in a direct line of progress, obviating unnecessary delay in handling. The building is unusually well lighted where light is wanted and

Faithful

A Commendable Virtue Overdone.

Faithfulness is without doubt the most laudable quality of the human being, but like all good things can be excessive. John Dobbs accidentally bumps into Zeke, the village roustabout. Zeke is not hurt, but John is eager to make reparation for his tumble and so takes him into a store, buys him a new suit, besides putting some money in his pocket. Zeke is quite overcome by this kindness and swears never to leave the side of John. This causes not only embarrassment, but causes him to lose his sweetheart. Zeke, however, has a chance to make good by playing the hero at the burning building in which the girl is imperiled, saving her life. The subject, besides being a laughable comedy, possesses rare scenic splendor.

The Twisted Trail

A Story of Fate in the Mountain Wilds.

It is always that the unexpected happens, and little did Bob Gorman and little Molly Hendricks dream what Fate had planned for them. When she started for the East to school Bob, the foreman of her father's ranch, could not resist revealing his love for her. This might have occasioned his discharge, but he being a reliable man, and she to be gone for so long, the father is tolerant. A year later, however, word is received of her intended return. Bob shows that he has not changed in his feelings and a quarrel ensues, during which the father dies of heart trouble. There being no witnesses, Bob is, of course, accused of killing him, and is forced to flee to the mountains for safety. Here Fate contrives, for Molly on her way through the mountains, is beset by a couple of Indians and is in dire peril until rescued by Bob. He takes her home, feeling that it meant his death, which would have occurred had not the coroner's arrival saved his neck from the rope of the pursuing ranch hands.

THE TWISTED TRAIL.—Little Molly Hendricks is leaving her papa's California ranch for the East to attend school. Bob Gorman, the foreman of the ranch, a bright young chap, has long had a tender feeling for the girl, but has never had the courage to declare his love. However, now that she is going so far and possibly for so long, he cannot restrain himself, and reveals this feeling. His action displeases his employer, Mr. Hendricks, who is of an irascible nature, and his first inclination is to discharge him, but reasoning that the girl is leaving at once and there can be nothing further come of the affair, he curbs his temper on advice of his doctor, who warns him of the result, he being a victim of heart trouble. All goes well until a year later, when Molly writes of her intended return, stating she will not tell the day of her arrival, as she wants to surprise them. Bob, learning the news, is beside himself with joy, but the owner quarrels with him, and during the convulsion of his passion succumbs to his affliction. There are no witnesses to the quarrel, and of course the foreman is accused of killing him. On learning of the ranch owner's death, the hands band together and search for the foreman, who, realizing the danger of his helpless position, has fled to the mountains, for hanging he knows is the punishment to be meted. He has succeeded in eluding his pursuers and makes his way high into one of the rocky peaks, where he falls exhausted. From this point he can see almost the entire trail as it winds through the hills. He is not here long when he hears the cry of a woman, and climbing to a point of vantage, is horrified to see Molly, who has been making her way homeward over the trail on a burro and is waylaid by several Indians. From where he stands he fires and wounds one of the red devils, and in a panic they flee. When he arrives at the girl's side, he finds her burro gone, and she suffering a sprained ankle. To take the girl to safety would mean his own death, but his love for the girl induces him to make the sacrifice. They haven't proceeded far when, confronted by the searching party, one of whom takes the girl in charge while the rest take the poor fellow off to the woods to hang him, despite the girl's entreaties. This, Bob would have suffered, had not the timely arrival of the doctor, who discovered the real cause of Hendrick's death, prevented it. Hence, it is by this perilous, circuitous trail that Bob reaches the heart of the ranchman's pretty daughter.

FAITHFUL.—John Dobbs, a young man in good circumstances, goes a-courting, and returning from the home of his lady fair, his auto runs down Zeke, the vacuum-pated roustabout of the town. Although Zeke was not hurt, he was the recipient of a severe jolt which gave him a temporary case of nerves, which scared John into a fit of earnest solicitude. Imagining the tattered condition of Zeke's clothing was due to the accident, he not only soothes his imaginary hurts with a balm of silver dollars, but takes him to the store and buys him a suit of "hand-me-downs." Zeke is quite unaccustomed to such a bestowal of munificence, and his gratitude is accordingly excessive. So much so that he then and there swears eternal friendship; that he will never desert him; that he will stick to John through thick and thin. John cries, "Holy smoke! what am I up against?" and jumping into his auto dashes off under the impression that he has left the poor simple-minded Zeke on the sidewalk. But not so, for when he alights at his home, Zeke is there beside him, having hooked on behind the machine as it darted off. Well, John's troubles have only begun. He can't move but what Zeke is at his side, his face wreathed in a smile that is childlike and bland, exclaiming—"I can't be happy away from you." Thinking he has eluded his zealous friend, John visits his sweetheart, and during an interesting moment of their tete-a-tete, Zeke's head appears between, earnestly pleading his friend's cause. This sends the girl away in a huff and John receives a letter later that it is all off between them, as she did not know when she became engaged that she would have to tolerate his idiotic friend. This throws John into such a rage that he feels like murdering faithful Zeke. He does, however, club him, but Zeke receives the blows with angelic smiles. It is no use. Flight seems the only course, and John beats it. He has covered miles and sinks down from sheer exhaustion. There he sits, panting, but happy in the thought of at last evading his tormentor, only to glance up and see Zeke's beatific countenance gazing fondly down at him. "Well, I suppose I must make the best of it." So he takes Zeke by the hand and resolves to accept his well-meant devotion. Henceforth the two are inseparable. Zeke, however, has his good qualities and is always solicitous of John's welfare. Later, Zeke has an opportunity of showing his true value. The house in which John's former sweetheart resides is afire, and the girl is in great danger of perishing in the flames, when Zeke passes. The whole town is in a panic, and the first thought was the fire company, whose aid is instantly summoned. While the firemen are dashing furiously to the scene, Zeke is playing the brave hero, for seizing a ladder close by he ascends to the window of the girl's room and carries her down to safety. John has heard of the conflagration and thinking only of the girl's evident peril, rushes up to find her safely in the arms of faithful Zeke. Things are squared and the value of Zeke's devotion recognized and appreciated.

EDISON MFG. CO.

A WESTERN ROMANCE.—The story tells of two children who are betrothed, while both are living in the East, in conformity to a clause in a will by the provisions of which a fortune is left to the little girl providing she marries the boy before her twenty-fifth birthday. Shortly after the betrothal the parents of the little girl move to the West, where she grows up, forgetting entirely the sweetheart of her childhood days.

When she learns that her hand was promised in marriage while still a child she refuses to abide by it, protesting that she will never marry any man unless she loves him. Of course her mother writes this to her old friend, the mother of the boy, and also sends a photograph of the girl. When the young man sees the picture he falls in love with the original at once and starts for the West, under an assumed name, to win her love and affection, the young lady, of course, being unaware of his intended visit.

Arriving at the little town in the West he finds he has a rival, but has little difficulty in taking the lead in this race for love. In fact he makes so deep an impression on the start and progresses so rapidly in his love-making that he has the field entirely to himself so far as the young lady is concerned. His rival, recognizing the necessity of prompt action if he is not to lose out in his suit, hires some of the Indians of his neighborhood to do away with our hero, and they are only prevented from doing so by his sweetheart, who had overheard the plot and who rescues him in a thrilling manner. Shortly after this the young lady and her mother visit the East, and there the young lady is again urged to marry her childhood sweetheart. She refuses emphatically, protesting that her heart has been given to another, unaware of the fact that this other is her boy lover under an assumed name.

THE MAN WITH THE WEAK HEART.—It begins in the doctor's office, where our hero is told that his heart is very weak and that he must handle himself with great care, avoiding any physical exertion or violent exercise. He goes mournfully away, shaking his head at the thought of the uneventful life he must henceforth lead. But on his way home he passes a group of men who have been trying to get a big cake of ice into a building. It has been too much for four of them, and he becomes impatient as he watches their efforts. Pushing them aside he seizes the tongs in his left hand, raises the two hundred pounds with apparent ease and slowly carries the ice to the door. He has hardly left this locality when he runs into a "tough bunch" from the lower part of town, and for having accidentally jostled one of them is offered a thrashing by the crowd. Quite forgetting the doctor's orders, he sails in, and in short time knocks them all three out, and walks triumphantly over their prostrate bodies. By this time he is quite convinced that his heart is really very weak and that any heavy work would probably be fatal. Consequently, when he finds a street car off the track and about twenty people unable to lift it back he becomes very impatient and, picking up the end of the car by himself, swings it easily into place. On his way home he passes a building in the course of construction. A huge stone which has gotten beyond the control of the workmen drops upon him and crushes him flat to the ground, but, mindful of the doctor's orders not to exert himself, he easily lifts the five hundred pounds and holds it out at arm's length above his head, while the workmen bow in awe-stricken admiration of his prodigious strength. Then he goes home.

Mindful of the dangers of exertion, he dare not take the baby when his wife holds her up, and the picture closes with a scene showing the whole family attendant upon his every wish and caring for him with all the solicitude which his precarious condition certainly demands.

THE SUIT CASE MYSTERY.—A young drafts man loses his position by reason of the fact that a prolonged strike has closed down the works in which he had been employed. He is on his return home when, in crossing a busy street, he is struck by an automobile in which is the assistant paymaster of a large contracting concern, who is carrying a suit case full of money with which to pay off the men employed in the construction of a large building. The sudden stoppage of the automobile throws the suit case containing the money into close proximity with that of the young draftsman. Strangely enough, the two cases are of exactly the same pattern, and in the confusion attendant on the accident one is mistaken for the other, the young paymaster picking up the draftsman's suit case and vice versa. When each reaches his destination the mistake is discovered, to the amazement of one and the dismay of the other.

We see in the picture the result of this complication,—in the suspicion cast upon the young paymaster and also in the struggle which goes on in the mind of the man who has become the possessor of the money. The latter, whose widowed mother is living in such extreme poverty that she is on the point of pawning her wedding ring and some other pieces of jewelry to purchase the necessaries of life, is strongly tempted to keep what has fallen into his hands, but his mother's counsel prevails and he seeks out the owner of the money. By a peculiar coincidence the pretty sister of the assistant paymaster had met the draftsman just after the accident and helped bind his wounded hand. When he returns the bag to the police station they meet again and finally, when the contractor to whom the money belonged, and who had recognized in the young man's mother the widow of a friend of his younger days, rewards our young friend by giving him a good position, he meets her frequently, the result being the usual happy ending.

THE GIRL AND THE FUGITIVE.—Minnie Harding, a Western maiden, is preparing for a hard washing day. Sam, the nigger helper, is assisting her with the wash, carrying water and filling the tub. While he is making his third trip to the well, a cowboy rides up to the cottage and asks Minnie for a drink. She goes to get it and the cowboy, taking advantage of her hospitality, makes love to her. Minnie repulses him and the cowboy becomes insulting. When Sam returns he finds Minnie struggling in the arms of the cowboy, but being a coward himself, he runs out to the road to see if other help cannot be secured.

Ross White, another cowboy, is cantering by when Sam sees him and tells him that Minnie has been insulted by a strange cowboy. White is a good friend of Minnie's and, hurriedly dismounting, runs to the house. White orders the cowboy away and the latter, menacing White with future revenge, sneaks away.

The scene changes to the front of a little Western saloon and gambling house. White rides up, dismounts and enters. Seating himself at a table, he takes a hand in a game of poker, but soon detects that the other cowboys are cheating. White accuses one of the fellows, a quarrel is started, there is a flash of revolvers, a shot is fired, and White breaks through the crowd and runs outside.

White hurries to Minnie Harding's cottage and begs that she conceal him from his pursuers. The girl, thankful to White for his defending her earlier in the day, hides him in a closet just as the leader of the cowboys raps at the door.

She admits him. The cowboy inquires if White has been near, informing her that they had seen him near the cottage. She shakes her head. The cowboy, finding the girl alone, makes love to her and White is again forced to defend her.

But the cowboy is too quick for White this time, and with his gun levelled against White's breast he disarms the latter and ties his hands securely behind him. Then he turns to the door, goes out and fires his revolver twice, the signal to the rest of the men that the fugitive has been caught.

But in the meantime Minnie has cut White's bonds and when the cowboy re-enters White lunges at him and disarms him.

When the cowboys dash up to the cottage the leader is permitted to step out and state that White has made his getaway again. To make sure that the cowboys will not misconstrue their leader's words, White has pressed the end of the cowboy's revolver against its owner's ribs and threatened to shoot him if the scheme does not work.

The scheme does work, as the leader clearly indicates that White has gone off through the woods and that they had better hurry right after him. The cowboys ride away and White drags his captive into the cottage again. After he has made sure that the other cowboys are well out of the way White liberates the leader.

Then he turns to Minnie and stretches out his hand. She hesitates and he opens his arms to her. She runs to him and gathering her in his arms he kisses her tenderly.

makes a feeble excuse and hurries out of the room.

THE HAND OF UNCLE SAM.—Frank Smith, an American mining engineer, has in his employ a native clerk, who is the leader of a gang of conspirators, working to unseat the present Dictator. Early one morning the clerk calls a meeting of the conspirators in Smith's office. In the midst of their discussion they are interrupted by the sound of footsteps outside, and, hurriedly concealing their papers and weapons in Smith's various desk drawers and pigeonholes, all bolt out. Smith enters, seats himself at his desk to begin his day's work, when the door opens and a captain of the native troops followed by a few soldiers enter and with explanation begin their search. The government has got wind of the meetings of the conspirators being held in Smith's office and have ordered that the place be carefully searched for evidence. Evidence is obtained as the soldiers turn out drawers and bring forth incriminating documents. The American is supposed to be the ringleader of the gang and is consequently arrested and dragged before the commanding officer of the Army of the Republic. A hasty interview follows and Smith is unceremoniously dragged off to prison to await trial.

A short time later, Mrs. Smith and her sister have received word from headquarters of the arrest of Smith. Realizing the peril of her husband, Mrs. Smith immediately sets about to obtain his freedom or the stay of a too hasty judgment on her husband. She and her sister go first to Smith's office and find the native clerk, acting suspiciously. In truth, the clerk had returned to obtain a certain document, which, if found, would incriminate him and the rest of his companions. He

THE MASTERMARK OF PICTUREDOM

An interview with the commanding officer secures them no satisfaction, as this stern individual declares that Smith will have an opportunity to clear himself at the court martial to be held that afternoon. Almost overcome with grief and anxiety, Mrs. Smith and her sister hurry to the office of the President of the Republic. He grants them a short interview, is suave, cool and polite, but offers them no assurance of the liberation of the American.

As a last and final hope Mrs Smith appeals to Robert Evans, the United States consul. Evans is sympathetic and assures them that they need have no fear, that he will adjust matters immediately. After the ladies have gone, Evans calls on the President, demanding the immediate release of the American. The President shakes his head "If Mr. Smith is found guilty of conspiracy against the government," he says candidly, "he will have to pay the penalty."

Court martial follows later in the afternoon and Smith is found guilty of conspiracy and sentenced to be shot at sunrise the following morning. As the sentence is delivered Evans runs on the scene flourishing a cablegram. It is an answer from the Secretary of War of the United States, and reads to the effect that the execution of Smith must be prevented; that a Unitd States torpedo boat destroyer has left the port of San Salvador to enforce this order and to liberate the American citizen, and that the United States government will accept no explanation from the Republic of ——— if the sentence is carried out Evans then orders the release of Smith. This is refused and Smith is dragged to his cell again to await the coming of morning.

Next is shown the United States torpedo boat destroyer, under full steam, coming down on the camera.

Morning dawns, rosy and clear; there is a tramp of feet in the prison yard and the American is led forth and placed at twenty paces from the little squad of soldiers.

The scene changes to the destroyer at anchor. A boat containing a dozen sailors pushes off from her side and heads for shore.

A slight interruption in the prison yard saves the American's life. A moment later the commanding officer, followed by a squad of Yankee sailors, enters and orders the prisoner released.

His innocence is established when the native clerk is dragged in and the incriminating documents taken from his person. The picture closes with Smith in the arms of his wife and Old Glory waving above them.

THE AIRSHIP GAZE.—An aviator is seen starting his machine for a flight through the heavens. A twist or two at the propeller and the buoyant bird-machine goes speeding off into the sky. Higher and higher he flies until he becomes a mere speck against the azure sky. Then, gracefully, he floats down and performs a few gyroscopic stunts to interest the observers.

We return now to the crowd who are gazing up at the airship.

A man carrying a ladder upsets another ladder, with its burden of painter, paint can, et al.

A farmer with a pitchfork, watching the heavenly visitor, runs into an open-mouthed Chinaman, who is also consumed with curiosity.

A chap with a high hat bumps accidentally into a lady. The hat is smashed and complications follow.

A negro scrub woman is upset by a "gazer," who overturns her tub. He gets not only a soaking but a vigorous drubbing from the exasperated colored lady.

A policeman, who is watching to see if the aviator is breaking the speed limit, is the prey of a clever pickpocket.

A milkman becomes so absorbed in watching the aeroplane that a tramp steals his milk can.

A chimney sweep bumps into a miller and the result is a fight in which considerable soot and breadstuff is scattered over the pavement.

And the aviator continues to cut didos in the air, utterly unaware of the terrible accidents which he is causing on earth below. But finally he tires of his sport and gently soars toward the ground.

When he alights an enthusiastic crowd gather about him, hoist him on their shoulders and carry him out of view.

A RANCHMAN'S WOOING.—Jed Perkins, an old ranchman, has four handsome daughters, of whom he is very proud, but whom he guards with jealous care. The opening scene shows a Western barn dance with the four daughters and their four admirers dancing before the camera to the tune of "The Arkansas Traveler," or some other old time jig tune, played on the squeaky violin of Pete Patterson. The scene closes with Jed and Widow Wiggs dancing the old Virginia Reel. This is the beginning of the ranchman's love affair.

After the festivities Perkins gathers up his offspring, the handsome four daughters, and corrals them into the buckboard. Then cracking his whip he starts on the long ride home.

Old Perkins has taken a sudden fancy to the Widow Wiggs and decides to propose marriage. A few days later he calls on the widow and finds her chopping wood. The old lady is having a hard time of it since Wiggs died and when Perkins proposes she agrees to marry him on one condition, that he get rid of his four daughters. The old gentleman is very deaf and the widow writes a note explaining the conditions to him. "I will never marry you while you have four single daughters. When they are all married I am yers."

Old Jed nods his head and asks the widow how he can get them married off quick. The widow writes again: "You say they have suitors and the dern fools won't propose. Well you just kick the fellers off the place and then they'll elope."

The old woman's philosophy listens well and Jed promises that he will do all in his power to bring a quick finish to his four daughters' romances.

His opportunity soon comes, because no sooner does he reach the house when he finds Daisy and Will under the old oak tree making violent love. Perkins kicks Will off the premises and threatens him with violent death if he ever again tries to make love to his daughter. Rose, Hyacinth and Violet, the other three daughters, are found with their beaux and old Perkins tries the same tactics with them.

The next day, while the old gentleman is taking his after dinner snooze out on the lawn the boys call and the girls, all ready for the trip, come out to meet them. They steal past the old man and hurry away after leaving the following note in the old man's lap: "Dear Dad—As you won't allow our beaux on the place we've all eloped. Daisy, Rose, Hyacinth, Violet."

When they are gone the wily old man jumps from his chair and makes haste to communcate to the widow. "Well, Widdy, I've done it," he says, when he jumps out of the buckboard.

And true to her promise the Widdy allows him to press a kiss to her lips, vowing to be his until death do them part.

A MOTHER'S HEART.—A jealous wife visits the husband in his office and finds him consulting with the typewriter. Her display of temper amuses the girl, who writes a loving note and slips it in the husband's pocket. The wife finds the note and determines to leave home, though the leaving involves the desertion of her two children. But the sense of wrongdoing deadens for the moment the mother love and pride later prevents her from making an appeal to her husband. She has obtained employment as a nursery governess in the home of a sympathetic woman who guesses the cause of her suffering and when a photograph of the children gives her a clue to the address, her own little boy writes to the son of the governess. The lad's reply makes plain the misunderstanding and the repentant and heart-hungry mother hurries to the children she loves and husband whose big heart finds it easy to forgive and forget as well.

TWO GENTLEMEN OF THE ROAD.—Two small boys lay in a stock of half-dime novels and proceed to an old mill to read them. They amuse themselves by writing a note in imitation of one in the book and this they place in a niche in the wall to be later discovered when their play reproduces the scenes of their reading. Two tramps discover the hiding place and take the letter to be the note of some thief to his pals and then start out to locate the hidden loot to which the note makes reference. The directions are vague but the tramps are persistent and they ar not disheartened by a few disappointments. They continue their search for the cellar to which the note refers and tumble into the basement of a building which houses a physical culture school. The janitor sees them enter through the window and with a policeman gives chase, but the tramps hear them coming and hide themselves in barrels whence they emerge when the pursuit has passed to th far end of the cellar. They are stealing up the stairs when they are rediscovered and a chase ensues in which the tramps penetrate the class room of the physical culturist where a number of young women are enhancing their graces with Delsarte movements. Here their pursuers find them and they are taken off to jail still in darkness as to the whereabouts of the treasure and still convinced that they could have found the hidden loot had they been left alone.

HIS SPANISH WIFE.—Robert Harrison is partner with Ted Mason in a plantation in one of those South American republics where they have a revolution every three weeks or feel lonesome. Harrison has the plantation end and Mason does the selling, but Harrison is needed in New York to put a deal through and Mason comes to look after the plantation in his absence. Mason falls in love with Harrison's sister-in-law but he has earned the enmity of Mrs. Harrison because she feels that he is responsible for Harrison's trip away. She frustrates Mason's love making while indulging in a lively flirtation of her own with an old admirer. Ted tries an elopement but it only lands the lady of his love in a convent. Then Mrs. Harrison, bored by ennui and piqued because she was not taken on the New York trip, decides to elope with Signor Estrada. Mason blanks this plan and in so doing wins his wife, for Mrs. Harrison realizes the gratitude she owes him.

THE DAUGHTER'S CHOICE.—A young wife, hurt by her husband's absorption in his business interests, fights in vain against the insidious advances of his supposed friend, a broker. Neglect at last induces her to elope with the broker in the hope that she will find in his tender love forgetfulness of the past. But the price must be paid by those who play. The broker loses his fortune and they are reduced to dire poverty. The broker pawns his small belongings for the money to buy food and medicine, but the sacrifice is in vain, privation and grief have done their work and the woman dies. In his despair the broker seeks to follow her out into the unknown, but the touch of tiny hands rouses him to a sense of new responsibility. He throws down the pistol and decides to live for the little daughter who shared her mother's flight. Fortune smiles again, the girl grows to a beautiful woman, believing the man to be her father, but the heart speaks strongly and when by chance the real father encounters her in her step-father's office, she elects to go with him, abandoning wealth for her father's love. The broker commits suicide, leaving his wealth to the girl, and she marries the man of her choice.

PATHE FRERES.

UNCLE'S MONEY.—Poor old Uncle is about to shuffle off this mortal coil. His niece is heartbroken—the more so as the old chap has not yet made his will and he is well heeled with worldly goods. She, poor thing, is alone in the house with the dying relative (except for the man servant) and something must be done to turn the antique's money into its proper channel—to wit, the pockets of her brother and herself. In dire need she sends for her brother, and that gentleman in wild and exuberant haste hies him hence from the wiles of the city to attend like a dutiful nephew the anguished couch of his avuncular relative. Fate is against this paragon of virtue, however, and he arrives at the house without his breath or his uncle, because the inconsiderate old man had, almost at the moment of his nephew's arrival, curled up his toes and departed this life. Much anguish, gnashing of teeth, and copious tears! "Uncle" failed to leave his wealth to anyone and where will it go? There is a hurried consultation nad a final suggestion which is adopted unanimously by the self-appointed committee of two. The nephew decides to impersonate "dear Uncle" and in a most foxy manner loosen up the dead man's clutch. He assumes a fatal-illness expression—a thing of small effort, as the poor boy is sick enough over his ill luck; he crawls into the bed and sends word to the local law shark to come and take his last will and testament. Enter the law shark. The sick man makes his will, leaving all to his nephew and niece. Clever work! All is now well, the will signed and the representative of the law is about to take his fee and his departure, when lo! and behold, like Lazarus, the old fossil—the inconsiderate Uncle—arises from the dead, so to speak, and after assuring himself that he has only been unconscious for a little while, routes the loving relatives out of the house and taking the astonished lawyer by the arm leads him to a desk, where he dictates a will leaving his entire fortune to "The Society for the Propagation of Wild Turkeys."

TOBACCO CULTURE.—The island of Sumatra is famous for its tobacco, as all lovers of the weed know. Its preparation, its growth and the various stages through which the fragrant leaves must pass, before they are ready for the smoker, form the interesting theme of this beautiful colored picture. The first scene shows the young plants growing close together, and the transplanting as they increase in size. The soil is poor for anything but tobacco, and one wonders how a good crop may be obtained in such poor land. We are shown, successively, the natives picking the largest leaves, the inspection of the picking, and the natives carrying bundles of green tobacco to the tallying room. Here the leaves are again inspected and sorted, and put in great piles to be cured. The temperature in these piles runs up very high, and is watched with great care by inspectors, who record the degree of heat taken with thermometers fastened on long bamboo poles. After the curing

THE CAPTIVE.—The scene of this film is laid in Morocco. The wife of a planter is kidnapped during the absence of her husband and her captors take her to the Sultan, who has her placed in his harem. The European repulses the advances of the Chief with horror, who, however, is not discouraged by her unwillingness to accept his attentions. In the meantime the woman's husband has returned home, and when he finds that his wife has disappeared he jumps on his horse and starts out to hunt for her. He has not gone far before he sees two women standing by a well talking—he soon finds out that they are the wives of two of the Chief's men, and after they have told him the truth about his wife, he offers them gold if they will deliver a letter to the latter, which they consent to do. To go back to the Chief: he has finally become exasperated at the woman's obstinacy and thinking to tame her has her beaten unmercifully by his slaves. She finally escapes and the barbarous chief is properly punished by the victim's husband.

A BULL FIGHT IN MEXICO.—The fight for life in El Toreo, the famous bull-ring of Mexico City, between William Pickett, an Oklahoma half-breed cowboy, commonly known as "the man without fear," and Bonito, the fiercest and most dreaded Spanish bull of all the Mexican republic. The unprecedented encounter took place a few weeks ago before 25,000 persons, the largest crowd ever assembled in the great ampitheatre.

THE TROUBADOUR.—Three suitors aspire to the hand of Muriel, the miller's daughter, one a big, handsome captain, with a fierce mustache; another the scrivener, who thinks his money bags will gain him the desire of his heart, and third, Harold, the minstrel, debonnair and gay, whose music has charmed the maid into confiding her affections to him.

Unfortunately, the daughter's choice does not coincide with that of her parents and the minstrel is banished. By the magic of his music, however, he calls up a supernatural being and the gift of a talisman suddenly endows him with fortune which he forthwith places at the disposal of his lady love. Muriel still refuses to marry, however, without her parents' consent, and Harold speeds away to ask it once more. Meeting with a peremptory refusal, Harold uses the magic power of his talisman to force the obdurate pair to give way. Uncanny apparitions dance in the kitchen, and the hanging bags of flour become most gruesome objects, causing an inquiry to be made by the guard into the doings of the miller and his wife. Now is Harold's chance; with a wave of the talisman the fearful apparitions disappear and the thankful parents give the desired consent. The marriage is thereupon celebrated with rejoicing in a scene of brilliant splendor, and the miller finds that after all his daughter's choice was best.

THE EXILE.—This is the touching story of a husband who is obliged to flee from his country because in a moment of passion he was rash enough to kill an enemy, and who after many years have elapsed returns to his own fireside only to find his place taken by another, and his memory obliterated by those cruel years of enforced absence. He stands for a moment looking in at the door he knows and loves so well at his much loved wife and daughter, who has now grown to womanhood, as both these women who hold such a warm place in his heart sit smilingly entertaining a handsome youth who is soon to wed the girl. When they perceive the aged stranger the girl hurries to give him something to eat, but the food sticks in his throat as he realizes that neither recognizes him, but look upon him as a poor beggar whom they must feed as they would any other forlorn individual that presented himself for food at their door. With the tears running down his cheeks the old man turns out into the cold and unsympathetic world again, preferring to be a wanderer for the rest of his days rather than to interfere with the happiness of the loved ones, who, he has proven to himself, have forgotten him and who no doubt would only be subjected to humiliation were he to make himself known and wish to take up his life again in that home as husband and father.

WILD BIRDS IN THEIR HAUNTS.—The picture shows various kinds of birds in their natural environments, and in their natural colors, and at such close range that the very eyes of the little fledglings in the nest are easily discerned. Every feather seems distinct and the birds seem to be in such relief that it appears as though one could almost reach out and catch them.

A WILLFUL DAME.—Suzanne's father insists upon her marrying a man she doesn't like, and because she refuses, locks her up in her room to come to her senses. Suzanne thereupon climbs down into a little room built out from the main building of a big Parisian hotel and restaurant. Observing a messenger boy's clothes scattered about, she makes up her mind to disguise herself.

In another room of the same hotel, Lord Edward Corn Plaster, Attache to the British Embassy and a spoilt child of fortune, is fuming and fretting because the lady who was to dine with him, has trumped up some trivial excuse for disappointing him. He writes her a cute note and demands a messenger. Enters Suzanne, but before she is well out of the room again, Lord Corn Plaster has changed his mind and requests her to keep him company at dinner. All goes well until coffee and cigarettes are served, and then poor Suzanne suffers. Her hair falls down, and Lord Edward, midly astonished, as becomes a phlegmatic Britisher, hastens to her assistance.

At the same moment, the father and suitor appear on the scene, and angry expostulations are withered by the prompt action of the Englishman, who having suddenly made up his mind that Suzanne is the girl for him, asks for her hand then and there.

A WOMAN'S REPENTANCE.—The hero of this story is a country lad in love with a pretty, though frivolous girl, the daughter of a nearby farmer. In the first scene, the girl is shown finding out in the good old-fashioned way, by means of a daisy, whether "he loves me or he loves me not." After a bit, the farmer is seen coming down the road to the old homestead, and he presents to his sweetheart the token of his love—the only thing of value he possesses—a silk scarf. They seem to be very happy together and the long Summer days are a joy to both of them. One fatal Summer afternoon, a wealthy young man from the city rides by on his horse, and begs a glass of water from the dainty girl he sees opposite the well. Struck by her beauty, he determines to win her affection, and with the help of his polished manner and the grace which he has learned in the drawing rooms in the city, he soon persuades the girl to accompany him to town. Shortly afterwards the farmer goes to call upon his lady love and finds only the scarf which he gave her lying on the coping of the well, where she has left it in her hasty flight. Gradually the truth dawns upon the poor young fellow, and in an agony of grief he sobs out his very soul in the silken folds of his gift. His anguish of mind finally leads to a spell of sickness, and he rises from his bed insane. Now the poor fool is the butt of all the jokes and pranks of the youngsters in the neighborhood as he wanders aimlessly about, fondling the scarf in his arms. One day, to escape from his tormentors, he enters a park and near one of the benches, slips and falls, striking his head against a stone coping on the wall. At a nearby table, with her newfound lover, sits the little country girl. We can scarcely recognize her in her fine clothes, with her altered appearance. Beneath her haughty exterior, however, is a warm heart, and when she sees the fool fall and injure himself, she rushes to his assistance, scarcely heeding the protests of her companion. When she recognizes the poor fellow, she starts back in dismay at the havoc she has wrought, and fears lest he recognize her and be revengeful. However, no flickering beam of intelligence is seen in his face, and moved to infinite pity, the young girl leads him gently along the flower-bordered paths to a pool, where she bathes his wounded head and feverish cheeks with the cool waters. After having refreshed him thus, she gently leads him back to the old farm, and bit by bit, by showing him first one familiar object and then another, she recalls the incidents of the past to his mind, until before long reason is again enthroned. With his awakening intelligence, all the old love wells in his heart and he pleads with the girl to return to the simple life of the country. This she does. The last scene shows the two happily embraced, with a long vista of happiness stretched out before them.

THE HORSESHOE.—In a lonely castle, the Princess Alice passes her days in weariness. She dreams of a handsome suitor who will come to release her from her boredom, but her life is a solitary one and the fulfilment of her dream seems improbable. From another chateau, a hunting party sets out. Prince Charming's horse casts a shoe. Returning with his mount, alone and on foot, the Prince is surrounded by brigands and taken to a cavern to be held prisoner until ransom is exacted. Meanwhile, the Princess has received the gift of a horseshoe from the God of Love, who promises her that it will bring the fulfilment of her desire. Cupid then speeds away to the robbers' cave, pours a sleeping potion into the drinking cups of the brigands, and Prince Charming escapes. Princess Alice, during all this time, has grown weary of waiting for the promised appearance of a liberator, and in the moment of anger throws the horseshoe out of the window. A cry of pain arrests her attention. She runs to the window and sees, extended on the grass, a man with his forehead covered with blood. Frightened, she descends, and hastens towards the man, who is none other than Prince Charming. She offers him the hospitality of her chateau, herself nurses the victim of her precipitate action, and in so doing, has the happiness of realizing Cupid's prognostication.

FOXY ERNEST.—A domestic altercation is the outcome of Mrs. Ernest Spendquick's extravagance in the purchase of a new hat, which is not lessened by Mr. Spendquick's sudden desire to acquire a grandfather clock. His wife sharply reproaches him in her turn, and in a whirlwind of feminine anger, leaves him to complete the bargain, which is destined never to be made by Mr. Spendquick, for the clock is bought by a gentleman passing with his wife. Mr. Spendquick, divided between admiration for the timepiece and the charms of the lady now owning it, finds out her address, gains admittance to her, and is subsequently hidden in the clock to avoid meeting with the husband. The result is that the clock gets out of order, the hands flying round at lightning speed, and it is sent back to the shopkeeper by its recent purchaser.

Meanwhile, Mrs. Spendquick has been joined in her walk by a gentleman acquaintance, who gallantly buys everything for which she expresses a fancy, and amongst other things is the grandfather clock, which she proposes in a spirit of forgiveness to give to her husband. Mr. Ernest Spendquick, therefore, again finds himself beneath his own roof, with comparatively little trouble on his part, and upon his reappearance astutely observes that he had chosen the clock as a hiding place to watch the proceedings of his wife.

A CONQUEST.—George, passing a pretty woman in the street, has recourse to that old-time trick of dropping his own handkerchief and hurrying after her, making believe that he thinks it is hers. On examining the handkerchief, the beauty returns it, telling George that it does not belong to her. He then confesses that he knows very well that it is not her property, as it happens to be his own, and his offering it to her was only an excuse to make her acquaintance, so struck was he by her beauty. Upon this frank declaration the young woman draws herself up haughtily, but George is not to be discouraged, but follows closely behind her, ready to be of any assistance on the slightest pretext. We therefore see him arriving at the lady's house laden down with such articles as a lampshade, a statuette, a bunch of roses, a bundle of dress goods, and, in addition, leading an enormous dog on a leash, against whose attacks he is endeavoring to protect himself.

Thinking, however, that the tet-a-tete which he expects to have with the beauty now that they

Length, 900 Feet

Here is a Big Sensation—"THE GIRL AND THE BANDIT," a great drawing title, and a subject that will make good from start to finish. It tells the story of how a young girl, single handed captured a notorious desperado for whom a big reward had been offered. Taken amid the beautiful scenery of Florida, and magnificent in photography.

ISSUE OF MARCH 25

THE RAILWAY MAIL CLERK

Length, 945 Feet

This great feature film will draw immense crowds because it is a railroad picture, and, because it reproduces that greatest of all stunts of Oliver Curtis Perry, who lowered himself with a rope from the top of a moving train, and, entering through a window, robbed the mail car. The film shows how the mail clerk was accused of the robbery and how his faithful wife ran down the real criminals and secured their arrest. A thriller of the most popular order.

have reached her home is well worth all the humiliation and inconvenience that he has suffered. George enters the house smiling like a basket of chips, only to be met by the woman's husband, who promptly kicks the officious stranger down the steps.

NO TRIFLING WITH LOVE.—The Baron, a wealthy nobleman living in his vast castle, surrounded by all the luxuries of the period, has an only son, Perdican. This son is his sole heir and the apple of his eye. He is anxious that Perdican should marry his niece, Camille. The latter is a tall, beautiful girl who moves with stately grace in the richly furnished rooms of the castle. She has just finished her studies at the convent, and Perdican is well pleased at the suggestion of his uncle. He, too, has just left his studies, and everyone thinks that the match will be a happy one. The days that now pass seem to be of unending sweetness, but finally Camille decides to renounce her affection for Perdican and take the veil. Perdican is in despair; nothing can seem to shake her resolution. Tears and pleading have no effect. Even the Abbe suggests that she reconsider her decision, but all to no avail. She thinks her purpose is steadfast, and that her life should be devoted to the service of the church. Piqued by her decision, Perdican decides upon a scheme—he will make love to little Rosette, Camille's foster-sister, and thus make his real love jealous and in this way, perhaps, cause her to change her mind about entering the convent. He therefore writes Rosette a note calling her his "Sweet Rosette" and begging her to meet him by the lake. He also sends a letter to Camille at the same time, making a rendezvous with her at the same place and hour, in order to make sure that she will witness his love-making to Rosette. But Camille was too cute for him. To be sure, woman-like, she did not relish seeing him paying court to her little sister, although she knew it was only a ruse on his part to arouse her jealousy. She therefore decides to open Rosette's eyes to the man's duplicity and therefore hides the girl behind a screen on the occasion of Perdican's next visit to herself. Poor little Rosette suffers agony as she hears from her place of concealment the false man whispering terms of endearment to her sister Camille, for this is Rosette's first affair of the heart and is taken "au grand serieux" by the girl. Finally, unable to bear the agony and humiliation of her position another moment, with a moan of despair she rushes from the house out to the beautiful bordered walks and the magnificent shady trees where she had spent so many happy hours as a child, scarcely recognizing, in her present miserable and heart-broken self, the happy, care-free girl of a week ago. The many happy hours spent beneath these same fine old trees, when her heart was bounding for very joy at being alive, seem to the girl now but a happy dream. Wringing her little hands as she turns from side to side like a frightened child endeavoring to get away from some terrible bogey that pursues her, she darts first this way then that until in the distance the gleam of the smooth waters of the lake seem to call her and promise peace and rest from this terrible tumult raging in her breast. She hurries on, therefore, and as she reaches the cool waters, she stops and gazes at her reflection, thinking that she is much too young and fair to be so very, very unhappy. But what else can she be when the one that she loves best in the world and whose ring she has worn so proudly for the past week, and the very sight of which even now makes her poor foolish little heart beat, has so cruelly deceived her and changed for her the entire world from a place of happiness and love into a cold prison destitute of any promise of hope, and from which she must escape, no matter by what means? As her trouble looms up before her black and overpowering, the usually timid girl, seized by an insane impulse, plunges into the waters which soon envelop her and seem to shield her from her trouble, and she lies there as peaceful as a child. In the meantime someone on the estate has noticed the girl's wild actions and hurried to the house to acquaint the family of the fact. Camille and Perdican, interrupted in their love-making, hasten out of the house, accompanied by Camille's aged father, and the three rush wildly around the flower-bordered paths and through the fine old shade trees, hoping to get a glimpse of the girl. Camille knowing more about the true situation of affairs than do the others, is the first to think of the lake, and dashes ahead. But, alas! too late, for scarcely have her wild eyes scanned the surface when she perceives the dainty little fiegure of her dear Rosette floating like a tender flower on the water, looking as peaceful as if she only slept. Camille becomes like a mad woman for a moment, but still has hope that her sister might be resuscitated if they could manage to get her to shore. Calling loudly to Perdican, the latter takes off his coat and soon reaches the little cold body, which he reverently and gently bears in his arms to the agonized sister and father on the beach. Little Rosette's sufferings are at an end, however, though they can hardly believe it, so lifelike does she look as they vainly endeavor in every way to set the little heart to beating and the soft eyes to open once more.

SELIG POLYSCOPE CO.

DAWN OF FREEDOM.—Cuba was fighting for the liberty and love, for the life unburdened by the yokes of bondage—she was striving to free the poor and oppressed and Col. Maceo was leading his people against the enemy. Mendoza—an unwelcome suitor for the beautiful daughter of Maceo—desperate over his rebuffs, leads the enemy against the struggling Cubans, fearing the appeal to Old Glory. The wires are cut; a duel is fought to the death in which the brave old General is wounded. His last and immortal words to his brave subjects were: "My passing sees for Cuba the dawn of freedom."

CROWDED OUT.—Every train brought the sightseers, the city hotel had out the S. R. O., but the delegates with the long ribbons had to be served. The last arrival at the tavern was Ben Smith and the delegates from Peach Run District. They were assigned a room next to a bridal couple, cautioned to be very quiet. Ben did not consider the room worthy of a Peach Run delegation; the landlord was sure Ben was mistaken and the difference of opinion leads to a riot. The result was that various noises emanated from the seat of war, to the disgust of the bride and groom next door, who, after braving the storm for some time, report to the office.

The committee from Peach Run was hauled upon the carpet—condemnation proceedings are in session. Out of respect for Hocumville's pride, the hotel, the foundation was left standing and nothing done toward removing the well. Otherwise the Milkmen's Convention was a dignified success.

IN THE FROZEN NORTH.—A brutal husband leaves his wife and causes a letter to be sent reporting his death at sea. The wife, fainting at the news, overturns the lamp and sets fire to the house. Saved by an old sweetheart, she marries him later.

The call of the North brings this good husband to the gold fields; he prospers and is joined by his bride.

At a merry making in honor of her arrival the brutal husband appears and by threats of exposure is about to take her away, when a friend—for there are such hearts of gold in that frozen North—interferes for the happiness of the good and worthy and ends the existence of the brute.

And over this tale of our far-flung North, God mantles the earth with His white snow of peace and purity as an emblem of good will to Alaskan hearts.

THE VILLAGE INVENTOR.—The son of Seth Dean, the village blacksmith, was the possessor of a genius' mind. He works for weeks upon a mechanical device, his efforts being jeered at by the town gossips. Mildred Van Dyke, the daughter of a rich manufacturer, drives her machine in front of the shop one day for repairs. The son looks after her as she speeds away—her handkerchief is seen to fall. John picks it up. That evening he incidentally meets the Van Dykes, stops the machine and returns the handkerchief. Mr. Van Dyke becomes interested in the invention and asks John to visit him. A bargain is struck—a new firm organized. The prospects of fortune win the daughter—the papers announce their wedding—the country sweetheart is forgotten. Years later John finds his mistake—the wife tires of him. He is divorced and returns to the home of his childhood and the little country girl he left behind.

WIZARD OF OZ.—Folk lore, legends, myths and fairy tales have followed childhood through the ages, for every healthy youngster has a wholesome and instinctive love for stories fantastic, marvelous and manifestly unreal. The winged fairies of Grimm and Andersen have brought more happiness to childish hearts than all other human creations.

Yet the old-time fairy tale, having served for generations, may now be classed as "historical" in the children's library, for the time has come for a series of newer "wonder tales" in which the stereotyped genie, dwarf and fairy are eliminated, together with all the horrible and blood-curdling incidents devised by their authors to point a fear some moral to each tale. Modern education includes morality; therefore the modern child seeks only entertainment in its wonder tales and gladly dispenses with all disagreeable incident.

THE TREASURE HUNTERS.—The old sea captain, who for forty years has steered his craft through many a storm, is now on the eve of his last sailing—that to the Great Beyond. The family doctor and the two nephews, Horace and Darrell, are at his side. His will is passed to Horace and read, and before the last word has left his lips, the seafarer is no more.

The will tells of the hidden treasure on some distant South Sea island. Weeks later finds the nephews sailing in search of the unknown land, the finding of the treasure, encountering danger, sensational escape, return home, completing a story of intense interest, enhanced by beautiful photography.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

VICTIMS OF FATE.—The body of the victim is carried to his cabin, where his daughter and son mourn their loss. Surrounded by his friends, the son plans an attack on "The Dawsons." The daughter of Bill Briggs is the sweetheart of Jim Dawson, and when she hears her brother conspiring to kill her lover, she determines to warn him. Her brother suspects her purpose and tries to prevent her. She escapes from the house, however, goes to the Dawson "shack" and tells young Dawson of his danger. She begs Jim to flee for his life; for her sake he is finally persuaded and with his mother persuades his father to go with him.

The two women are left alone, and soon the girl's brother, with his followers, besiege the cabin. Mrs. Dawson, a woman of nerve and passion, seizes a rifle and through a "peep hole" returns the volley of shots which suddenly penetrate the door and windows, killing the mother of young Dawson and wounding young Briggs's sister.

The brother and his companions hearing no more shots, batter in the door and discover the women on the floor. Bending over the bodies, young Briggs recognizes his sister. Waving his companions from the room, he bids them return to their homes. Alone with the dead, Briggs gives way to throes of extreme grief. Young Dawson now returns home and covers young Briggs with his gun, who shows that he is unarmed and points to Dawson's mother and his own sister. Dawson is horror-stricken and sorrowfully clasps the girl to his bosom, then rising to his feet, hands his gun to Briggs, bares his breast and tells him to shoot, that he is willing to suffer for the sins of their fathers.

Filled with shame and sadness, he offers his hand to young Dawson and points to the women: "You have lost a mother, we have both lost my sister." The men clasp hands and forgive. Suddenly they notice that the sister shows signs of life and rush towards her, lifting her in their arms. She slowly opens her eyes and looks into the eyes of her brother, and then her sweetheart's, and smiles, tells them to forget the past and to love each other as she has loved them both. While they tenderly support her in their arms, she is happy and satisfied that she has not lived in vain.

THE MYSTERY OF TEMPLE COURT.—A young girl who loves an unworthy young fellow, of little character and less conscience, consents to a secret marriage. After a spell he tires of her and deserts her. Through a letter he has left, she follows him to England, where she eventually traces him to an apartment, where he has been living in style and comfort. He has just received a letter from his father, who suggests that he would have him return home, where he can arrange a marriage for him with an heiress.

He is just preparing to go when his wife confronts him and pleads with him to recognize and protect her, and when she throws her arms about his neck in pleading embrace, he seizes her with the fury of a demon, strangles her and throws her to the floor. Bending over the body, he discovers that she is dead. For a moment, he is overwhelmed with remorse, lifts the body and locks it in a closet. Placing the key in his pocket, he hurriedly scribbles a note to his landlady and leaves the house.

The young man returns to his father's home and we see him in the midst of a gay and brilliant reception, at which he is introduced to the heiress, who receives him passively, as she seems to favor another suitor, who figures largely in the plot of the story, for it is shortly after this scene at the reception that this young suitor visits London and takes lodging in the same apartment in which the young wife was killed.

Dozing before the fire, he has a dream in which the murdered woman appears and points to the closet. He cannot dismiss this dream from his mind and decides to look in the closet. The door is locked. He forces it open and finds the body of the girl. He notifies the landlady and she notifies the police, who follow clue after clue until they decide that the previous occupant of the room, who left it so suddenly, is the murderer.

While these denouements are taking place, the young murderer has gained consent from the heiress to become his wife, and just as they are about to be married at the church rail, the young suitor appears with the police, stops the marriage, and the young murderer is arrested. The heiress turns in gratitude to the man who has saved her from marriage to a murderer and villain, acknowledges her love for him, and he is not slow in declaring his love for her; both plight their troth with parental benediction.

THE COURTING OF THE MERRY WIDOW.—Two jolly old souls, fat, foolish and forty, fall ardently in love with a fair and figureless widow of forty summers and all the other seasons besides. They are rivals for her hand and fortune and immediately lay siege to her susceptible and romantic heart, sure that the best man will win.

They groom themselves carefully for the conquest and start out for the fair one's domicile, one fortified with a bouquet and the other with a box of "sweets." While one of them with his "bonbons" is making love and pressing his suit, the other one with his bouquet inopportunely appears upon the scene, interrupting his rival, who glares fiercely at him as he sheepishly slips out of the room, leaving the bouquet holder alone with the object of his affection.

Only for a moment however; the engaging widow is too absorbed in her book and candies to give heed to her fat beau, who retires from the room in confusion and despair. Each one of the lovers feels that the other has defeated him in Cupid's fray and one sends a challenge to the other. The challenge is accepted and the duel is arranged.

Just as they are about to start the bloody conflict, a messenger is seen rapidly approaching the field of battle. He comes forward and hands the contestants each a letter which reads: "If you love me, come to me at once.—The Widow." They drop their swords and make haste in hot chase to the adored one. The race is a close one and both reach the house of their beloved one at the same time, only to learn that she has been married to another.

They are downcast and inconsolable, a pair of fallen, battle-scarred heroes defeated by an unknown warrior, who carries off the prize package. "Stung!" they ejaculate simultaneously. Then they shake hands and smile. They go out and smile again, then everybody smiles. You just can't help it.

CAPITAL VS. LABOR.—The daughter of a capitalist and manufacturer is courted by a young officer of the militia, and, at the same time, a young clergyman is deeply in love with her. She seems to favor the military man, because, as she says: "She prefers a man who does things, to one who simply preaches them."

Dissatisfaction arises among the employees of the big manufacturing plant of the town. A committee calls upon the manager and proprietor, whom we must identify as the father of the young lady who is in love with the young soldier. The committee requests a recognition of their rights; the manager refuses.

Trouble seems imminent and the young clergyman appeals to the proprietor in behalf of the men. His intercession is also denied. The strike is on, crowds assemble in mass meetings, agitators incense them with hatred and inflame them with vengeance, and violence runs riot. The mob marches towards the home of the manufacturer, whose household has been warned of the approaching danger.

The young officer is visiting the daughter. She appeals to him for protection and asks him to intercede with the mob. He dares not face them single-handed and promises to return with his regiment and protect her and her home. Then he leaves her.

The mob attacks the home, breaks the doors and windows and forces an entrance into the house, demolishes the furnishings and threatens her father, in whose arms she is clasped. While the fury of the mob is at its height, the young minister rushes into the room, checks and silences the strikers and gains from their employer all their claims and privileges.

After this has been done, the young officer returns with his regiment, but there is no need for his services. The young clergyman has won the respect of the capitalist, the cause of labor and the heart of the young girl, who now knows that he is not only a man of words but also a man of deeds.

THE HAND OF FATE.—Striking it rich, the hero of this Western drama cashes in his gold dust and cleans up a large sum of money. He decides to go back to the city. Bidding his friends and companions good-by, he starts on horse through the wild country for the railroad station.

One of his compaions who saw him display his "roll," lies in wait at a lonely point, shoots and robs him. While he is taking the money, he unconsciously drops his watch. The horse of the wounded man returns to town riderless. His friends become suspicious and start out at once in search of its rider and find him lying wounded and unconscious.

Beside him they find the villain's watch, which they think belongs to their wounded friend; they place it in his pocket and send him to a hospital in a nearby city. While in the hospital he falls in love with his nurse.

When he recovers from the wound, his possessions are returned to him, among which is the watch that was dropped by the robber when our hero was robbed. At once he recognizes the name of the thief inscribed in the cover. He leaves the hospital and goes back to the mining camp to make a fresh start and make another fortune. Success is with him once more. He marries the pretty nurse, who afterwards dies and leaves him with their daughter, who grows into womanhood and becomes engaged to a very worthy young fellow, who brings his father to meet his sweetheart and her father. When the two older men meet, the young woman's father recognizes the father of the young man as the treacherous friend who shot and robbed him years before. He makes himself known to his false friend.

They agree to keep secret his villainy for the sake of their children, but with the distinct understanding that he will leave them forever. The young folks are married and the false friend leaves for parts unknown. Lonely and friendless, we see him riding over a desolate plain out of sight and into obscurity.

A BROKEN SPELL.—Proud of the honor and distinction of entertaining a celebrity, the Count brings the famous musical composer to his residence, introduces him to his wife and extends to him the hospitality of his home. While the musician is enjoying the Count's generosity, he incidentally calls attention to the resemblance which two large portraits on the walls bear to his host and hostess, complimenting and showing admiration for other furnishings of artistic taste.

The wife, who is of artistic and impressionable temperament, is fascinated by the composer. A reception is held in honor of the distinguished pianist, and, after the guests have departed, escorted by the husband, the musician and the wife are left alone. He plays an emotional waltz. She is irresistibly moved by the soulful music and glides into a dance of graceful litheness and charming poses, scattering roses as she sways about the room.

As she is passing the artist, he catches her in his arms and passionately kisses her; he pleadingly declares his love, but, as if continuing the dance, she leaves the room, throwing him a rose which she takes from her bosom, she disappears through the door.

At this moment the Count enters and kisses his wife, who wakes startled and stares in wonder at him. With the vividness of her dream impressed upon her mind, she can hardly realize she herself has not been killed for her actions with the composer, and now, fully conscious of her own weakness and its possible results, throws her arms lovingly about her husband's neck, thankful that the spell is broken and she is saved from its consequences.

The next morning, while the composer and the Count are seated at breakfast, the composer receives a telegram calling him to Paris. The Count urges him to stay. The composer says that he cannot and asks the Count if he has a time-table. The Count leaves to get it, and while he is gone his wife enters and is approached by the musician. She repulses him. He is disappointed and disgusted with her coldness.

The husband returns with the time-table, is greeted affectionately by his wife. The musician takes the rose given him by the wife and throws it on the table; accompanied by the Count, he takes his departure for Paris without so much as a nod from the wife, who can only contemplate her fortunate escape from her own frailty.

JOHN HARDY'S INVENTION.—John Hardy has invented a flying machine. It works perfectly in his own room with only his devoted wife and himself as spectators.

A party of capitalists assemble in the office of Mr. Malleck, who buys and sells inventions. They witness a trial of Hardy's flying machine model. The machine fails to fly, and the capitalists refuse to back the invention. Poor Hardy returns heartbroken to his humble home. His wife tries to cheer him up. As she embraces him a hairpin falls from her hair. Hardy picks it up and looks at it. With a pliers he makes a couple of bends in the hairpin, and his wife, after trying it, is delighted. "There is an invention that will fill a long felt want. Let's patent it." Hardy makes fun of his wife's enthusiasm and sets to work on his flying machine.

But Mrs. Hardy feels sure that she has a good thing, and she goes to the office of Malleck to interest him in the hairpin. A crowd of hungry inventors are also waiting for Malleck, so Mrs. Hardy writes a note to him asking if he will see her at his home and look at a great invention. Malleck replies by mail, telling her to call at his hotel after five. Mrs. Hardy puts the note into a drawer of her sewing machine. She visits Malleck and he agrees to consider the invention.

Three weeks pass. Mrs. Hardy goes out to Malleck's office to sign papers. Hardy works at his invention. He needs a piece of heavy thread, and he opens the machine drawer in search of it. He finds Malleck's letter to Mrs. Hardy. Hardy is crazed with jealous rage. Seizing a pistol, he rushes out. At the apartments of Malleck he is told by the valet that Malleck is out. "It is a lie!" On a table Hardy sees the model of the pairpin. That proves to him that his wife was there. He searches the rooms, and then rushes frantically from the hotel. As Hardy crosses the street he is struck by an automobile. He is taken home unconscious. The next day he is able to sit up. His noble wife is at his side. He raises his hand to push her away. The good woman places in Hardy's hand Malleck's agreement to pay Hardy $10,000 for his invention of the "Hardy Hold-Fast Hairpin," and enclosing a check for that amount.

Now Hardy understands. He begs forgiveness of his dear wife, and she answers him with a kiss.

THE LIAR AND THE THIEF.—Sikes, a gentleman of the Raffles order, reads in the paper that Mrs. Eldridge, a young society woman, who alleged that she had been robbed of her jewels, confessed that she had in reality pawned them—admitting that the robbery was a prearranged affair in which she played the leading role and her maid the supporting one. Skies decides to have it appear that the lady robbed herself a second time. Disguised as a clergyman, he obtains the jewels. Naturally, everybody believes Mrs. Eldridge again guilty! And then a clever detective turns up and shows public opinion mistaken by fastening the offence on the real offender.

BISON—

THE MAN FROM TEXAS. Bob Foster and Sam Loomis arrive in El Paso, Texas, after a hard day's ride, just at dusk. Bill Desmond, a big and burly fellow with a bad reputation, comes staggering down the street and bumps into Sam. Getting angry, Bill hits him, and is just about to hit him again, when Bob grabs his arm, saying, "Why don't you hit your own size, you coward!" Bill pulls his gun, but Bob has the "drop" on him first, telling him to sneak or there will be trouble. Bill sneaks off, vowing vengeance on Bob. The next day they meet on the street. Bill pulls his gun and fires at Bob, but Bob is too quick for him and Bill falls dead, shot through the heart. Bob, knowing that he will have to stand trial for Bill's death, mounts his horse and dashes away. A few weeks later Bob appears at the ranch of William Barlow, in California. Barlow, needing a cowboy, employs him. A few days pass by and Bob is beginning to feel at home. One day, while out rounding up the cattle, Barlow discovers that he has forgotten his pipe and tobacco. He sends Bob back to the house for it. Bob reaches the house just in time to hear Hank Benson insult Sue, the pretty daughter of Barlow. Benson, not knowing that Bob is near, tries to kiss Sue against her will. Bob rushes up and knocks him down. When he gets up, Bob orders him off the ranch. From that moment on, "Cupid" starts to get busy. Three months pass by, and everything appears to be "sunshine and roses," until one day the Sheriff posts a notice reading: "$1,000 reward for Bob Foster, dead or alive; wanted for the murder of Bill Desmond, El Paso, Texas." Benson, seeing the notice, tells the Sheriff where Bob can be found. Going to the ranch, they find Bob and tell him that they have come to arrest him. Bob pulls his gun and a fight takes place, in which all three are wounded. Barlow comes from the house to learn the cause of the shooting and is shown the Sheriff's notice. He says that he does not believe the charge against Bob. Telegraphing to El Paso, he receives an answer telling him that Bob shot Desmond in self-defence and is not considered guilty by the court. Barlow then tells Bob that he knew he was a square fellow and would like to have him for a son-in-law. Sue, hearing this, says, "He is; we were married last week."

COMPANY "D" TO THE RESCUE.—Colonel Gordon and his pretty daughter Belle are waiting for the stage coach to arrive to take them across the plains. Just as they are about to start off they are warned that the Indians are hostile and that they should have an escort of cowboys. Two or three volunteer to accompany them. The Indians watch with triumph the approach of the stage coach, and as it comes through the mountains follow after. There is an exchange of shots, but when the open prairie is reached the Indians attack the coach and make a prisoner of Belle, the Colonel's daughter. The two surviving cowboys, Jack and Jim, after overcoming other of the Indians, decide that Jim should go for the mounted troops and Jack in pursuit of Belle. When Jim reaches the army headquarters and tells of the happenings, the Captain and his company mount their horses and leave for the scene of action. In the meantime, Jack has reached the Indian village, has overcome the guard, released the girl, mounted her on a horse and dashed for freedom, as the Indians awake and pursue them. Shown the evidence of the Indian outbreak, the soldiers need no further encouragement to do away with the Indians. By the aid of his field glass the Captain locates Jack and the girl, closely followed by the Indians. Jack, wounded, falls from his horse, and Belle dismounts to aid him. At this crucial moment, when the Indians' victory seems almost complete, Company "D" dashes to the rescue. While the soldiers give chase to the Indians, Belle is tenderly caring for Jack's wounds.

AMBROSIO—

THE SEA'S VENGEANCE.—Lola, a beautiful Italian girl, hears that her chum, Santa, is going to marry Cici, a young fisherman. Enraged with jealousy, she vows that she will win his heart. One day as Cici passes Lola's home she bestows upon him a captivating smile. He is enraptured by her beauty and soon forsakes his old sweetheart. A short time later Santa meets Lola and Cici on the beach and tearfully begs her lover to return to her. Cici, annoyed by her pleadings, strikes her to the ground. He then bids farewell to Lola and departs on his fishing boat. Santa arises, this time not with tears in her eyes, but with a look of hatred upon her face. She raises her hands and puts a curse upon Cici. That night, as if in answer to her call of vengeance, a hurricane arises and the waves, rolling and pitching, dash Cici's boat against the rocks and all on board are lost. The next morning, Lola, waiting and watching for Cici's return, finds his body as it is washed ashore; and thus she learns that the sea has brought about the punishment for Cici's desertion of his first love.

ITALA—

FOOLSHEAD WISHES TO MARRY THE GOVERNOR'S DAUGHTER.—Foolshead is employed in a shop. He thinks more of making eyes at the master's daughter than of serving the customers, and between serving one and another he finds time to kiss her more or less secretly. The neglected customers complain, and so the gigantic master takes the diminutive Foolshead and throws him out of the shop. Rolling between the legs of a passerby, he passes through the window of the underground goods deposit and falls plump in the midst of boxes and parcels. After much difficulty, he succeeds in returing to the shop and wishes to recommence his love adventure. He is discovered and again begins the usual flight, full of accidents, which ends in a grand master stroke by Foolshead. Followed by a crowd of people, he places a large wardrobe in their way, and when they fall inside he quickly locks them in. He then sits triumphantly on the top with his sweetheart. The father, who is locked in the wardrobe, is obliged to consent to the wedding if he wishes to be set free from his inconvenient prison.

THE RIVALRY OF THE TWO GUIDES.—The old guide had for a long time held sway in his little village, and all the tourists who passed through it vied with each other to be conducted by him. But now all is changed, for he is no longer so surefooted and has a competitor in a villager who is young and who is preferred by all. The old guide hates his rival. The latter, however, does not reciprocate this feeling, and on the contrary wishes to be friendly, because he is in love with the daughter of the old man; but it is all in vain. The hatred of the old guide is rekindled by recent preferences and he decides to take revenge. He cuts a little footbridge, over which the young guide must pass, and waits. Here a terrible coincidence; instead of the young man, the old guide's wife passes over the bridge first and falls heavily into the abyss. Fortunately a rock breaks her fall and holds her. The young guide arrives at this moment. He understands the danger which he has escaped, but generously swings himself into the abyss and saves the woman. The old man's feelings are changed by this great self-sacrifice, and embracing each other they remain good friends from this time on.

A DRAMA ON THE REEF.—This episode embraces the mercantile profession in many of its various phases. The splitting of a happy family when the father goes to his ship, the departure from port, the wreck of the vessel, the shipping offices and the attempt to recover the cargo stowed aboard. Two dishonest shipping agents attempt to smuggle gold dust, and use for this purpose the vessel of a certain Captain Roberts, who, unbeknown to himself, ships the same. Shortly after, the vessel is wrecked on the celebrated Silver Reef, a much-dreaded group of rocks close to the coast, and goes to pieces. The next day the Captain's children determine to go and find "their Daddy." At last they do discover him, with several of his crew, washed ashore and apparently dead. The Captain recovers, however, and helped by his two brave little ones struggles towards home. Previous to this the two shippers have endeavored to recover the bullion they have lost, and after a perilous journey succeed in recovering it. Bearing the heavy case between them, they succeed in raching the rocky eminence that overlooks the reef and there fall asleep. Greed is rapidly engendered in the breast of the first riser the next morning and he endeavors to carry the heavy burden away. His efforts, however, arouse his companion. Then there follows a most exciting struggle for life, which finally ends by greed claiming two victims instead of one. Shortly after, the Captain and his children discover the treasure and it passes into his hands, and the dismal thoughts and trials of the past are eclipsed by the visions of happy days to come.

CURED BY A TIP.—Boots feels tired; he wants to go to bed. Bother the work! He must do it, yet at the same time it is becoming almost imperative that he go to sleep. His brains, therefore, are soon at work, and shortly after, he adjourns to the hall, where he proceeds to enjoy forty winks on the settee. Very soon some visitors arrive and Boots' services are in demand. In order to awake him, they proceed to dig him in the ribs, punch him, and to generally badger him, but without effect. Then a German band is called into try their hand, but in spite of the exquisite misrendering of the "Merry Widow" waltz, Boots is still unaffected. The doctor then is summoned and he prescribes electric treatment; this does have some physical effect, but it quite fails to awake him. At last a gentleman who knows something about Boots in general brings out a coin and drops it upon the ground. Boots awakes, grabs the coin, then takes the full measure of sadness and bitter pain from the hands of those whose displeasure he has incurred.

ECLAIR FILMS.

THE TREASURE OF LOUIS.—Louis is a poor fisherman of Brittany who is in love with the daughter of a well-to-do innkeeper, but who cannot marry the woman of his choice on account of his dire poverty.

One lucky day, as Louis and his fellow-fishermen are hauling in the net, Louis, to his great consternation, discovers a small casket entangled in his net. Upon opening the casket, a number of gold pieces gush out, and in the bottom lies a folded parchment containing some undecipherable inscription. Something prompts Louis to the belief that the document is worth more than the gold, and so that there will be no wrangle, offers his companion the gold, while he himself retains the ancient parchment. For some time Louis is unable to make anything of the inscription, but one day while he is standing before a mirror, endeavoring for the hundredth time to gain some intelligence from the curious writing, he glances in a mirror, and all is made plain—the inscription has been written backwards, and the precious mirror reflects, to the eye of the astonished Louis, the following words: "Let him who knows not fear search the depths of Gael's Gulf, where lieth the treasure of Morgan the Great."

Louis confides his secret to his fiancee, who courageously volunteers to be his companion in his adventure to the dread Gulf of Gael. So they set sail, and after many hardships and dangers, the treasure is located and brought to the surface, and the lovers return home triumphant.

Louis is now enriched, and the innkeeper no longer refuses him the hand of the daughter. Herr Innkeeper, therefore, announces the engagement, and a great celebration is made in honor of the event. During this great festival, Louis is made to take too much wine, and in consequence he becomes incautious, and informs some of the men present of the existence of his treasure, and they, becoming interested, force him to mention the place where the precious jewels are hid. These unscrupulous men at once plot to rob our hero, but Jenny, having overheard the conversation, counterplots, and is able to have the treasure saved just in the nick of time. So they are happily married, and—all's well that ends well.

A TRIP TO BERNE.—One of the Eclair educational gems which affords us a most comprehensive appreciation of that beautiful Swiss capital, cradled in the world-renowned and mighty Alps. We have here an excellent opportunity of learning a great deal of Swiss architecture in the study of the Federal and other interesting buildings and institutions, and learn much of the quaint customs of these dwellers among the crags. One of the chief features of the film is a visit to the famous bear-pit, in which is nurtured most carefully a great family of Swiss bear—the beloved emblem of the Swiss nation.

NESTOR FILMS.

THE TENDERFOOT.—Everyone on the ranch was in a flutter of expectation; even Long Bill grew excited as the hour for the arrival of Jack Bigelow, the new ranch owner, grew near. Ann Weston, the foreman's daughter, had been unanimously selected to meet the tenderfoot—his first impression of them must be favorable. By some miscalculation Jack arrived earlier than expected, but remembering his old comrade, Sheriff Warner, stopped in to renew their friendship. The delighted Sheriff would have been glad to accompany Jack to his ranch had duty not called him in the opposite direction, to search for "Gentleman Jim," the outlaw, so lending Jack a horse, he carefully pointed out the way. To better observe his surroundings, Jack had been allowing his horse to walk, when suddenly the bridle was gripped by an iron hand and the tenderfoot looked into the muzzle of "Gentleman Jim's" gun. The outlaw found very little money on his victim, but discovered the deeds to the ranch and a receipt for the money just sent by Weston, and if it was still in Weston's safe he might easily obtain it by impersonating the tenderfoot for a few hours and robbing the safe. So by exchanging clothes with the unwilling tenderfoot and mounted on the Sheriff's horse the outlaw had no difficulty in obtaining recognition at the ranch as the new owner. Bigelow was a sorry looking figure in the outlaw's rough clothes and was about to return to the home of his friend, the Sheriff, when he was overtaken by Ann Weston, who was driving to the depot to meet the new owner. She kindly offered to give him a lift, and her frank, impersonal manner led him to relate his experience and reveal his identity. Outwardly sympathizing with him, but secretly amused, she drove him back home, to have her amusement turned to indignation when she found that her father and the cowboys disbelieved Jack's story, and when he was unable to produce the deeds declared him to be an impostor; but flocked around the outlaw upon his arrival and gave him a hearty welcome, and locked up the "dangerous impostor." Being thoroughly convinced of the truth of Jack's statements Ann steals out in the darkness and gets Long Bill to go for the Sheriff. In coming back into the house, her suspicions are confirmed as she finds the new "owner" in the act of opening the safe. Fortunately his back was turned, and slipping up the stairs she returned as though coming from her room, after making a noise to apprise him of her approach. If she could only keep him until Long Bill returned with aid—a task she found easier than she anticipated, for he was not averse to being entertained by a pretty girl; so the time passed without arousing his suspicions until he started for the door to ascertain the cause of approaching horsemen, to find himself confronted by his own guns, which Ann had contrived to steal from him. The Sheriff's arrival put an end to the masquerade, and with shamed and foolish faces the boys released the new ranch owner.

"IMP."

STUNG!—Two rivals for the hand of a girl are having a fine time stealing marches on each other, and on this occasion they are invited to a whist party at the damoiselle's home. In the course of the evening one of them is very much tortured by a shoe that was never intended for his foot, and when he is seated at a table he takes advantage of the opportunity to remove the tight shoe. Soon the company is called to supper, and the shoeless man is in a fine fix. He gropes frantically for the footwear, and the guests discover his predicament. He is flustered, but not for long. Remembering that his rival was near the table, he gets an idea. Telling the guests that he will find the shoe through a trick in clairvoyance, he furrows his brow and apparently thinks profoundly, makes a few mysterious passes, and suddenly counts four on his fingers. Then he quickly counts off four people to the right—it is his rival! The company looks on in amazement as he turns him round and extracts the shoe from his back pocket!

THE STAGE NOTE.—A young lady is interested in amateur theatricals, and she is preparing to receive the members of her society, who are going to conduct their rehearsal at her home. The dramatic professor arrives, the actors soon follow, and we see them going through a tur-r-ible "drammer," in which an effeminate chap plays a wicked burglar; ties a girl with a cord, and is about to chastise her when her lover, real hero that he is, enters; he picks up the note the victim has dropped, reading: "There are burglars in the house," and then deliberately walks over to the burglar and gives him an awful slap right on the wrist. Oh, it's an awful slap, and the burglar falls down on the floor and the hero embraces the gir-r-rl. The rehearsal is soon all over, and the actors go home. That night the young lady of the house is in her bedroom, when she hears the sound of footsteps in the dining-room. She timidly goes there, when two masked men spring on her before she can make an outcry, gag her, and bind her in a chair; she is helpless, but when they leave her there to ransack the rest of the house, she gets an idea. Throwing herself from the chair, she wriggles across the floor where is lying the same note that had been used during the rehearsal in the afternoon, reading "There are burglars in the house!" With a painful effort she drops it out of the window and then, with her teeth, pulls down the lever of the telegraph call box. This done, she struggles bravely back to the chair. The burglars have by this time overpowered the servants, and when a messenger boy answers the call one of the thieves, in the butler's coat, tells him that it is a mistake. On his way back the boy stoops to pick up a cigarette butt that he had bunked, and finds the note. He rushes away a little faster than messenger boys usually do, and returns with two policemen, who capture the burglars and march them away. Then the bashful kid is subjected to a kissing at the hands (lips, rather) of the rescued young miss that makes up for the biggest money reward he could have won.

TRANSFUSION.—A girl who takes her fine little mare to the blacksmith's for new footwear, does not know that the strapping, sinewy smithy has a warm spot in his heart for her; nor does she find out until long after he has learned to just bear the heart-pang as though it were part of his daily life.

The girl has a lover, a fine, elegant young chap of her own station in life, who takes his horse to the same smith for attention. This fine morning the young couple are seen meeting at the blacksmith's shop, and later they canter out on the boulevard together. A little love-making adds to the pleasure of the ride, and soon we see the lovers part; the girl rides up a beautiful boulevard and suddenly her mount rears, runs away and finally throws her onto the ground at the side of the road. The riderless horse then turns about and runs straight to the blacksmith shop; the smith knows the mare and looks out expectantly for the owner, but he is greatly surprised when she does not appear and becomes alarmed. He mounts the horse and, riding back to the driveway, discovers her lying on the ground painfully hurt. In his strong arms she is carefully borne home, and the smithy runs for the doctor. The girl's lover also comes on the scene and, with an important air, puts aside the blacksmith's attentions, not even allowing him to go into the sick room. The physician in attendance announces that the girl is seriously hurt and requests that another doctor be called in consultation. The girl's parents and her sweetheart are gathered round the bed when the second doctor, a specialist, tells them that the girl, having been greatly weakened by the loss of blood, her system must be reinforced by the transfusion of the blood of another. Naturally, he turns to her lover as the most likely candidate for the sacrifice, but the latter shows his displeasure at the idea plainly; thinking to redeem himself, however, he suggests that he will procure a substitute. Going out of the house, he soon returns with the blacksmith. The latter is only too glad to make the sacrifice, and in a little while we see the operation being performed. After the antiseptic cleaning and the application of the local anesthetic, the forearms of both the girl and the blacksmith are cut at the arteries and a tube inserted between the two incisions, and the strong, healthy blood of the blacksmith flows in a steady stream into the system of the suffering girl.

The operation is successful, and we now see the young lady convalescing, with her sweetheart beside her. It is the first time he has seen her since the operation and she thanks him for the sacrifice that she thinks he has made. Knowing that she will eventually learn the truth, he tells her that it was the blacksmith who gave his blood as a contribution to her health. She is amazed, astounded, bewildered. Leaving her lover abruptly, she hurries straight to the shop, and what transpires there shows very plainly that the blacksmith has not made his sacrifice in vain.

HARD CASH.—The banker's confidential man is a heavy, unsuccessful gambler, and it means something to him when the newspapers announce that a certain firm has failed, for it will also affect his bank. While he and his employer stand aghast at the news an old sea captain enters with a deposit of $50,000, which is accepted and which practically rescues the concern from failure. The sea captain later reads of the failure and, knowing what that means to the concern with which he has deposited his life's savings, goes back there and tries to get it. But he is too late and the shock kills him. He drops dead in the office and the clerk takes the receipt for the money from the body.

Some years elapse in our story. The money has been the means of the concern's staying in business and the banker has waxed rich again. He has also fallen out with his gambling clerk and the latter, discharged, has gone West, gambled more and then, a human wreck, now returns to the banker for aid. He is refused, but the clerk shows him that he still holds the receipt for $50,000 and this changes the attitude of the other.

Now follow a series of attempts on the part of the banker to get the receipt. He goes to the squalid abode of the human derelict, who is now almost insane from poverty, and tries to outwit him, but he is unsuccessful. Driven to desperation, he resorts to gun play, but the other is quicker, and he departs baffled. Still intent on gaining his end, he resolves to burn the hovel, receipt, possessor and all. He tries the deed, but does not succeed. The house is in flames, the fire department is called out, and one young hero, dashing into the burning hovel, carries the clerk out.

We next see him at the house of the fireman, who, pitying him, has taken him there for attention. He is now quite well and, arising from his bed, looks about him at the home of his benefactor. Suddenly his eye falls on a portrait on the wall. It is that of the old sea captain! He looks at the fireman questioningly, and the fireman tells him that it is his father.

The ex-clerk is overjoyed and, with added incentive, plays well his game of vengeance with the banker.

FOUR REELS A WEEK—Tuesday, a "Bison"—Wednesday, Ambrosio—Friday, a "Bison"—Saturday, Itala

YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO MISS ANY OF OUR RELEASES FOR THE COMING WEEK

"Nannina," Tuesday's Bison release, is a powerful dramatic story, embodying several new and entirely different features in moving pictures.

"A Shot in Time," Friday's "Bison" release, is a Western picture which tells of an Indian servant, who, by quick thought, saves the life of his mistress's sweetheart by firing a shot, breaking a glass containing deadly poison extracted from rattlesnakes.

These two subjects have been acted by the original "Bison Stock Company" and are photographically superb.

As for Ambrosio and Itala releases, we can only say their productions speak for themselves. The two subjects about to be released are surely masterpieces and rank second to none with imported films.

"THE MISER'S DAUGHTER"

(Monday, April 4. About 980 feet)

Tears of laughter rained down my velvety cheek when I saw this picture. It's one of the biggest screams ever thrown onto a moving picture screen. Clean, wholesome comedy. Miss Lawrence and King Baggott at their very best. Get it if you have to telegraph your exchange every day. Get it! Don't read the synopsis till you've seen the picture or it will take away half the fun.

Physiological Effect of the Moving Picture.

Last week we devoted an article to the subject of the eye and the picture, telling the reader in simple parlance how he should co-relate the particular properties of his eye to his position in a moving picture house, in order to see the picture properly. Since that article was written we have had, curiously enough, several talks with people engaged in various phases of the moving picture business, by which it appears there is still a widespread impression that looking at the picture per se, and in the best circumstances, is dangerous to human sight. Speaking generally, the evidence that this is so, is not clear, and we would like to write a few reassuring words on the subject from the point of view of laymen having some knowledge of the structure and functions of the eye, and some experience in looking at pictures—an experience, as we have before remarked, dating back some thirteen or fourteen years.

We well remember how, in London, from 1896 on, much was said and written about the dangers to the eye, or rather the ill-effects on the eye, by looking on moving pictures. People complained of headaches and of many indefinable nondescript eye troubles. Many were the devices recommended for overcoming the effect on the eye of the jumpiness, or unsteadiness, or flickering of the pictures on the screen. A very simple plan recommended was to hold the hand some ten or twelve inches in front of the eye, with the fingers apart, and then, while looking at the picture, gently move the hand from side to side. This, roughly, provided something in the nature of a counter-irritant. In other words, it neutralized the jumpiness of the picture on the screen upon the eye. Then we remember Gaumont, of Paris, putting out a little fan consisting of a circular piece of paper mounted on a stick, the paper being folded and perforated in such a manner that when held before the eye something, again, in the nature of a counter-irritant was provided.

Not to go too deeply into the scientific end of matters, we can easily understand how these devices would prevent eccentrically excited light rays—that is what we will, for convenience sake, call the jumpy effect on the screen—injuring or, rather, paining the eyes. Provided that pictures are reasonably steady and that they are not looked at too long, there is really no reason at all why people should imagine that their eyes are affected in a particularly adverse manner by looking at them. Why should there be? What is motion on the screen but a graphic representation of what we see in nature, in life itself? You never hear people say that looking at crowds on the street, or horse-racing, or action on the stage, or any body of movement in life generally, injures the eyes. Why, then, should not the same be said with regard to the moving picture—provided the latter is steadily shown and is of good photographic and colorific quality? There is really no reason at all, speaking generally, why the picture should have an adverse physiological, or, rather, physical mal-influence on the eye.

Of course, there is the question of monochrome to be considered: this we shall discuss in a subsequent article. There is also the question of color. This, again, we shall be treating of by and bye. And, again, we are not referring to imperfect films—to those that have rainstorms or defects of any other kind. We are referring to the normal film of good average quality, steadily shown and with plenty of light behind it. Anybody with normal vision looking at these pictures for three-quarters of an hour or an hour, probably never complains of headaches, dizziness, or any other ill-effects ascribed to the moving picture. We say, normal vision, advisedly. We mean people of good eyesight. Not those whose eyes may be seriously astigmatic, for instance. Clearly, these people have no right to complain.

From time to time articles from physicians and surgeons are published, describing the disagreeable effects to the eye by moving pictures; but we think we are right in saying that no positive evidence upon this point exists. We heard the other day that vaudeville actors, pianists and others are refusing employment at moving picture theaters, because the moving picture hurts their sight, prevents them reading music properly, and the like. Probably, then, they are not yet habituated to the moving picture, or they have seen it where it is not properly shown. It is not the fault of the picture, as such, if, to repeat ourselves, as is probable, these people have a prejudice against it. It is ignorance. If they only familarized themselves with the picture in its best aspects, they would take up the co-operative rather than an antipathetic attitude towards it.

Exhibitors throughout the country would do well, where possible, to dispel any illusion they may hear expressed as to the harmful effect of moving pictures on the eyes. If they arm themselves with such of the arguments that we have briefly outlined in this article, then they may do a great deal of good by killing some of the many misconceptions which prevail with regard to the picture. Poor picture, it has a lot to bear! It seems to be considered in some quarters to be an obstacle to mental and moral progress; and now it is charged with being an opponent of our physical well-being! What next, we wonder?

The Stories of the Films.

The MOVING PICTURE WORLD has a very varied circle of readers indeed. Not only is it read by all sections of the trade, including the largest body of all—the exhibitor—but it goes into the hands of professional men, travelers, lecturers, literary men and others whose interest in the picture is of a slight or possibly only of a momentary nature.

Then, we have amongst our readers a very considerable number of the general public. By the general public we mean those who simply go to the moving picture theater for amusement. This section of our readers turns infallibly, week by week, to the stories of the films that we print. In fact, over and over again we hear some such remarks as these: "Those little stories that you print are just like condensed novels. We enjoy reading them, and if there is a story that we like very much, we go and see the picture." On other occasions we have been told that a visitor to the theater has actually taken a copy of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD with him or her and endeavored to follow the film by the story.

Why do we mention this? Simply, first of all, to show the wide and growing influence which the moving picture has, and is exerting. Also, to show that we are doing our part in familiarizing the public with the good work that is being done by the moving picture makers. It will be seen that our stories of the films take up a very large part of our space. They are printed in small, solid type and are costly from the printer's point of view. If we were intensely mercenary it would be comparatively easy to omit those stories and utilize the space in other directions. But we prefer to continue them because we find that all sections of our readers appreciate them, and that appreciation is not confined to the purely trade sections of the public. No, those stories, as we have already said, are widely read outside the moving picture field.

Now, we think this is good work in the interests of the moving picture and we are very glad to find that there is widespread appreciation of our policy. We have another reason for specially referring to this matter. We want the exhibitor to take notice of what we say in this respect. We want the exhibitor always to keep a copy of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD by him and when he hears of the moving picture theater being attacked, either in public or private, to produce his copy of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and show those stories of the films to the offender. In 98 cases out of 100 those stories are just as fit for home reading, for both young and old of both sexes, as the literature published by Dr. Anna Shaw and her fellow-zealots. On the other hand, to read some of the attacks on the films recently published in vaudeville and other newspapers one would think that the works of the most sensational novelists have been ransacked for plots. Not so. These stories, as anybody can read for himself, are usually quite innocuous, and, as we have heard many a time, they are making themselves good reading whether you go and see the pictures or not.

The Bianchi Camera.

Progress is the watchword of the world, or, rather, of the people who inhabit the world. Each day that comes and goes sees some step forward in human achievement. This is in the very nature of things. Were it not so, the human race would not be fulfilling its destiny. It readily follows, therefore, that there is no such thing as finality in invention. To come closer to our point, the moving picture is in a state of progressive evolution. It is a different and a very much better thing to-day than it was two years ago, speaking generally. A year hence it will be a different and a very much better thing, we hope and believe, than what it is to-day. Similar improvement goes on and is manifesting itself in the methods of making the picture—whether it be in the actual taking of the photograph, its development and after-treatment, and the methods of its projection and presentation to the public. Improvement is being made all the time and is the outcome of the application of many inventive minds to the work.

For the last year or two, much has been said, much has been heard of the Bianchi camera for taking moving pictures. Very little, however, has been really known of what this instrument is capable of doing, until recently. Practically nothing has been seen of what the camera can produce in the way of taking moving picture photographs. It has been the object of rumors and counter-rumors, and some have alleged that it is impracticable in use; others, on the contrary, have openly said that it was an impossibility to use it. However, it was inevitable that sooner or later we, who have always manifested close interest in the practical end of moving picture making, should have an opportunity of judging for ourselves whether the claims on behalf of the Bianchi camera were justified. That opportunity came to us the other day at the works of the Thanhouser Company at New Rochelle.

It will be remembered that in the issue of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD for March 12th, we gave a brief account of those works and also the aims of Mr. Thanhouser, who has brought his theatrical experience to bear in the production of the moving picture. Our impressions, as the reader will remember, were distinctly favorable to the Thanhouser factory and the aims of its president. And the second visit that we paid to those works confirms us in those impressions. For the Thanhouser factory is a well-equipped installation for the making of moving pictures. The stage has been well designed and is in competent hands; the development facilities are up-to-date and calculated to make good prints, and the tout ensemble of the factory is such as to impress us that Mr. Thanhouser's earnestness and ability will make good in the production of moving pictures.

Now, to the Bianchi camera. The reader hardly needs telling that the salient feature of the moving picture camera in general use is, that the film in its passage behind the lens has an intermittent movement, produced by the operation of sprocket and perforations. As the film is led down on the focal plane it has a brief moment of rest, and is given a brief moment of obscuration by the revolving shutter. This means, in practical language, that it is kept still for an appreciable length of time in order that the image may be rapidly impressed upon it. It is at the moment of rest for roughly, let us say, one-twentieth of a second. This, we repeat, is the fundamental principle of the camera mostly in use in the United States, if not the world, to-day.

The Bianchi camera entirely ignores this fundamental principle. The film in its passage along the focal plane behind the lens has a continuous movement. It is never at rest. It is always in motion. The reader will therefore perceive that in this respect the vital principle of the Bianchi camera differs entirely and radically from the principle of other cameras. In the latter we have practically what is very rapid stationary photography, and in the Bianchi camera it is very rapid movement photography. That is to say, while the subject moves so does the film upon which the image is projected.

In theory, then, according to the laws of persistence of vision the film in the Bianchi camera must, while not remaining still, have the effect of doing so, in order that a sharp image may be impressed upon it. If means were not adopted for keeping the film still for an appreciable length of time in the Bianchi camera, then you would not get a sharp image. You would have simply a blur and so your picture would be all fuzzy and out of focus. It would lack sharp definition the essential feature of the little pictures which go to make up the reel of moving photographs.

How, then, has the inventor overcome this difficulty, and, as it were, "squared the circle," in his camera? How has he reconciled theory with partial neglect of it? Simply, we may explain, by compensatory means in the optical part of the camera. Mr. Bianchi, with remarkable ingenuity, has worked out a beautiful optical problem in keeping his image still at the focal plane for the necessary length of time. To explain: Immediately in the axis of the taking lens, that is, in simpler language, at the back of it, he places another lens. Then, in the revolving shutter which is interposed between the lens and the focal plane, there is placed another specially designed lens, which, as the shutter revolves, is always erect and which, area for area, roughly synchronizes in movement with the particular part of the film upon which an image is imprinted. In other words, supplementary lens and film move together, so that the image which that supplementary lens receives is sharply impressed upon the sensitized celluloid. Now, nearly in contact with the latter, is a little frame which also moves perpendicularly to the axis of the image, so that the effect of this frame on the pictures is to keep each picture separate one from the other and prevent overlapping.

We have stated the principle of the Bianchi camera, we think, in as simple language as possible, in order that even the reader of limited knowledge may understand the exceedingly novel principle availed of in keeping the picture stationary on the film without the necessity of the film having to be at rest. To quote the familiar advertisement of one of the optical houses: "It is all in the lens." In other words, it is an optical principle rather than a mechanical one; whereas in the other form of cameras it is a mechanical principle rather than an optical. And therein lies the difference between the Bianchi and the other cameras, namely, that Mr. Bianchi achieves his result mainly by ingenious optical means instead of mechanical.

There are some other points with regard to this ingenious camera that deserve mention. First of all, we were naturally of the opinion that the loss of light by adding two extra lenses to the system would be appreciable. In practice, however, this loss of light is not very serious. Seemingly, for studio work, it does not slow the exposure to any extent. Then, again, we were also curious to ascertain whether this compensatory lens system gave a perfectly non-distorted picture. Apparently it does. In other words, the Bianchi lens system acts, roughly, pretty much as a telephotographic lens system in ordinary photography. A telephotographic lens, as the reader is aware, is a combination of lenses for giving enlarged images of distant objects with very short extension of camera. In the Bianchi camera the image is apparently not magnified, because the lens, as we have pointed out, is of a compensatory character as regards its focal length. Seemingly they do not distort the picture, nor do they slow the exposure very much, and, to sum up the whole matter, the Bianchi camera gives just as good a photograph for moving picture work as other cameras in use.

We specially witnessed the first release of the Thanhouser Company, which was photographed with a Bianchi camera. This was "The Actor's Children," to which reference has already been made and which has been shown in moving picture theaters these last few days. The critical examination of the photography from the technical standpoint shows that it was of a high order of merit. Just as good, in respect of definition, lack of distortion and general clearness of images, as the best photographs being made elsewhere. But more than that we ourselves, although the time at our disposal on the occasion of our visit was somewhat limited, put the Bianchi camera to a practical test. One of us turned the crank while the other sat on the stage and did a little acting with a charming young actress who figures in "The Actor's Children," much to the edification of Mr. Thanhouser, Mr. Bianchi, the staff and other guests. Then the few hundred feet that were exposed, were developed and brought to us for our inspection, and the negative, considering the nature of the exposure, turned out to be of very good quality.

So that, all in all, the Bianchi camera came out of the test and experiments with flying colors. It seems, so far as we can judge, to be a perfectly practicable instrument, demanding, perhaps, a little extra care and thought on the part of the camera man who uses it; perhaps a little extra care in keeping the simple extra devices in order; but, on the whole, an unquestionably practicable success. Perhaps it is right to say here that the Bianchi camera is being manufactured and rented under the auspices of the Columbia Phonograph Company, of Bridgeport, Conn.; that Mr. Bianchi himself is personally supervising its manufacture and that its use is open to the world on suitable terms of buying and renting.

We congratulate Mr. Bianchi on the success of his highly ingenious camera. We have further to say that we were very much pleased with what we saw and what was done with it at the Thanhouser works the other day.

LET THE GOSPEL IN.

By H. F. Hoffman.

A little experience with a store gospel congregation some time ago has given rise to a philanthropic idea within my fertile brain. No doubt I will get the "Ha Ha" from some of the wise ones, but "I don't care—I don't care."

Last Summer I signed a contract to close my theater and transfer my movable property to a large airdome that was to open nearby. Although my Summer's rent was taken care of by the contract, I was still mercenary enough to cast around for a Summer tenant for my building.

As the seats remained in the place, the tenant would necessarily have to be someone who wanted an auditorium. I could not imagine for the time being where I could pick up such a tenant until one Sunday night I happened to pass one of those store missions on a side street. The place was packed to the doors. The brethren and sisters were singing hymns to their hearts' content while sweltering in the early Summer heat.

"Here's my chance," thought I, and I managed to get the ear of a white-bearded old fellow, who looked as though he might have some authority. I suggested to him that the mission people were evidently in need of larger quarters and he admitted that such was the case. He told me also that a committee had been appointed to look for a bigger place, and then, seizing my opportunity, I described my theater to him in glowing terms. I told of the prominent location and the cool electric fans, the comfortable individual seats that were so much better than their hard benches. I told of my stage that could be used as a rostrum, as well as for special entertainments, and even went so far as to hint that once in a while they could give illustrated lectures or even biblical subjects in moving pictures to attract attendance, with a silver collection to swell the treasury. The old man listened until I got to the silver collection and then he murmured half to himself, "The Lord has answered our prayer."

The old fellow insisted that I should come around after the service and meet the superintendent, which I did. The congregation were as poor as church mice, but very lively and sociable; so much so that it took a half hour for any one of them to say good-night to the rest. When the members had departed I had my business meeting with the superintendent and committee. The idea looked good to them from the start. They went with me to inspect my place and were highly pleased with it I know, for they began to exclaim, "Praise God!" "Hallelujah!" "Amen!" etc., etc.

Finally the question of rent came up. They had been paying $20 per month and had found it always a struggle to raise the amount, so they had been hoping to reduce it to $18. When I told them the rent I expected they all threw up their hands and the deal was off. They filed out the door, and right there was where I made my mistake in not calling them back and letting them have the place for the mere cost of lighting.

As I said before, I was mercenary, and it was not until I had afterwards disposed of my theater that this generous idea came into my head, and I now give it out for what it is worth. It is not worth anything to picture houses that are already giving Sunday exhibitions, but to those that are not and are not likely to, it may be the means, if adopted, of gaining some popularity and respect, and perhaps some additional patronage.

Most managers are aware of the hostility of the religious element toward moving pictures and, therefore, if the church will not meet the exhibitor half way, perhaps it would help some if the exhibitor went all the way to meet them. In most every city there is some struggling gospel band. There could be no great loss if some charitable exhibitor were to approach them and offer the use of his auditorium free of charge on Sundays. He could thus offer them a prominent location, plenty of room for increasing membership which the arc lights would surely draw, a stage for the speakers, heat in Winter and fresh air in Summer, etc.

Yet by far the main item would be that the arrangement would give those people a chance to give good entertainments and make some money. They could hold their childrens' and Lenten and Christmas exercises in better style; they could, now and then, have their stereopticon lectures on China and what not; but, most important of all, they could give religious moving pictures and get a bunch of money out of a silver collection.

The point I wish to emphasize is: that in allowing them to give moving pictures under your own roof it would go a long way toward disarming criticism from the pulpit. Much ado could be made in the newspapers about this utopian alliance which would be bound to reflect some credit upon the good intentions of the exhibitor. There would no doubt be some increase in patronage. It would soon accustom the people to a Sunday show and probably start some men to thinking.

I understand well that many of the gospel stores are holding services several nights a week, but that is no matter. Let them still use the small store during the week and on Sundays hold the big meeting at your auditorium. One entertainment a month would pay the rent of the small store and any more would swell the treasury. Charge them for the light and heat if you must, but if you can afford it give it to them free. Taste the joy that springs from well-doing and they will rise and call you blessed.

A TIP TO FILM MAKERS.

In August, 1910, the Supreme Lodge of K. of P. and the Supreme Assembly and encampment of the Uniform Rank of K. of P. will meet in Milwaukee. There will be drills by the crack drill companies of the United States Knights of the Uniform Rank; 826 companies of Uniform Rank in the United States. The encampment of the Uniform Rank, at Milwaukee, will bring them from all parts of the country. Camp life, camp conditions, drills, parades, etc., will be the feature for several days.

The members of the Knights are prominent men, they will scatter to all parts of the country after the meeting—the films will be in demand.

Every Pythian Lodge in the world has a stereopticon and slides illustrating the play of "Damon and Pythias." On the friendship of these two Knights the order was founded. Many lodges have already discarded the slides and use the motion picture machines, and all the lodges are gradually discarding the obsolete for the up-to-date moving pictures.

This will mean that not only will the theaters get the first call on pictures taken in Milwaukee and have a very popular run, but after the theaters have used them hundreds of films could be sold outright to Pythian Lodges and for years after the theaters have finished with them they will be rented by Pythian Lodges for benefits and entertainments. It will never be a "dead subject."

A K. OF P.

The Chinese Theater afforded me a subject last week, because it showed an opening for the moving pictures. It is possible that had not Raymond Hitchcock been the backer, nothing would have been heard of the resort. It now appears that Hitchcock is not the main attraction. He is, as stated last week, the backer, but he appears to be the soft backer —not the real manager. The story will be continued in our next.

The manager of the Chinese Theater is William Kavanaugh. At least, he was the manager. He is now in a hospital. He lies there, cut and slashed as a genuine hamburger steak would look. In other words, he is badly "cut up." He looks so bad that he could not make a good fifty-foot length of picture film.

Now for the story. Mr. Kavanaugh was missing for a week. The Chinese Theater wondered what became of the manager. When a Chinese wonders there is something doing. Nevertheless Mr. Kavanaugh was missing, and it was not until almost a week later that he was found in a hospital unconscious. How he received his wounds may never be known. Some say that he was chief interpreter for District Attorney Jerome during the inquiry to fix the responsibility of the respective Tongs. I believe the true story is this: About one year ago a favorite comedian at the Chinese Theater was killed. I will not say murdered. And at that time Kavanaugh swore he would be avenged! If the latter story is correct, then there is nothing more to be said.

I only refer to the case of Kavanaugh to bring to mind that the Chinese have an extraordinary liking for moving pictures. They do like the pictures—but they evidently do not like the manager. Applications for the position of manager of picture shows in any Chinese settlements will be most cheerfully received, but it must be understood that if we locate any party it does not carry a life insurance policy.

It has often been said that you cannot beat the makers of the moving pictures. And the exhibitors have time and again said you cannot beat the exchanges. There is give and take in all this, but, as a man going around, I will say that if you can beat the exhibitor in the present play of the game you are a good one. The exhibitor watches every issue of every paper that is issued in the interest of the film business. There is not an exchange that fails to find a customer at its counter with a copy of a paper—almost invariably the Moving Picture World. They know to a dot when this or that subject is issued, and you can't fool 'em.

I used to be connected with a film exchange and I know how we dealt the dope. But you can't do it these days. You must make good. I know of some backwoods towns that would stand for anything, but now they want first run! Imagine a manager of a thirty-second rate opera house demanding first run! Why? Because the nickelodeon is there. I touched upon this in my last article. A painter once made quite a reputation on his "Westward Ho!" The painter never lived that can foreshadow the motion picture field! Its scope is unsurmountable, and I offer here the prophecy that none in the business knows its scope. Certain parts of it may be covered by certain patents, certain people now engaged in the business may become wealthy, but the man who stands true and steadfast to the welfare of the truth—the true test —will not die a pauper. In all times of life there is something to consider. The one great thing is profit. We all recognize that it does not behoove any many to profit by illegal or unfair methods.

I have before me the following communication, and I hope that when I answer it I will not be compelled to refer to the matter again. It is a topic on which all people conversant with the film business should be acquainted. Nevertheless, I answer once, and for all time:

The Motion Picture Patents Company report to their exchanges only such exhibitors that secure licenses from that company.

The aggregate number of exchanges, as specified by the last number issued by the Patents Company, does not show the number of exhibitors in the country. There are many cancellations, and, as I understand it, the numerical system is progressive. You may see, from whatever source your information may be, that the Patents Company has issued 14,897 licenses, but it does not follow that licenses to that number are in existence. To go on, it may be stated that the circulars of the Motion Picture Patents Company do not show the number of exhibitors in the United States. These circulars refer only to licensed exhibitors. It in no way refers to the independent exhibitors. I am not prepared at this time to state how many picture places there are in the United States, but, to make a rough guess, I would say about 12,000, and of these I feel prepared to say there are 7,000 licensed. I do not give this as official, for the reason that I am not quoting from official records.

I wish to advance an impartial opinion: So long as a question of patents is involved there will always be controversy; and so long as quick money is to be made there will be manufacturing. Always keep your eye on the oleomargarine cases. The united efforts of the dairymen failed to beat it. It is still on sale and labeled as the stuff. I have been thinking over this matter and believe I am right. The haymakers have their day, but reapers must be heard from.

PATHE NOT A TRUST.

An important case has just been decided in the Court of Common Pleas of Wood County, Ohio, in a matter in which Pathe Freres and other film manufacturers were alleged to be in an unlawful conspiracy in restraint of trade, in violation of the Sherman Act and the Valentine Act of the State of Ohio.

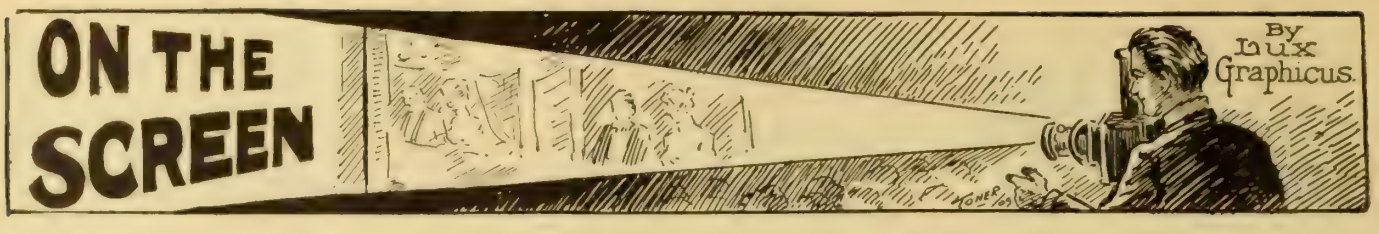
About two years ago Pathe Freres entered suit in this Court against the Co-operative Film Syndicate, of North Baltimore, Ohio, for the recovery of the purchase price of films sold to the defendants. The defendants retained George H. Phelps, of Findlay, Ohio, who is well known in that State as the "Trust Buster" Phelps who drove the Standard Oil Company from the State, to file a petition setting forth that Pathe Freres were part of a "trust," and, as such, asking damages against them in the sum of $20,000.

Pathe Freres were represented by Thomas F. Howe, of Howe & Fordham, Chicago, and Frederick J. Flagg, of Toledo, Ohio, in addition to local counsel in Bowling Green. Testimony was taken in Chicago a number of months ago, and the case was called for trial at Bowling Green a few days ago.

After a lengthy trial, in which the defense introduced considerable evidence to show that the plaintiffs were a part of an alleged "trust," the Court, on motion of Pathe Freres' attorneys, instructed the jury to disregard this claim in the defendants' petition and render a judgment on the merits of the original action. The jury returned a judgment in Pathe Freres' favor for the goods sold and delivered.

The people of Ohio have been "trust" mad for some time, and that part of the statutes of that State known as the Valentine Act is considered the most drastic and far-reaching in existence. It has already been upheld by the Supreme Court of the State and there have been many convictions thereunder, resulting in the fine of corporations and imprisonment of their officers and managers. Notable among these cases have been those of the ice dealers and the lumber dealers in Toledo.

This is the first case of this nature involving the film manufacturers in which a decision has been rendered, and coming from a Court of this State the decision would seem to effectually dispose of all chance that disgruntled exchanges or exhibitors may hereafter evade payment of their legitimate bills on the ground that the licensed manufacturers or licensed exchanges are an unlawful monopoly.



"Corbies should not pick out corbies' een." This is a Scotch proverb, which, when translated into the vernacular, means, roughly, that people of a class or kind should not quarrel about their business in public. Expressed more brutally, that there should be honor even amongst thieves. Better still, that esprit de corps should always prevail amongst the members of a class, and, indeed, amongst all classes.

To come to the point: Several writers in these pages, lately, whose business it is, or should be, to exalt the moving picture on every possible occasion, appear to be purposely playing into the hands of the enemy and giving the latter opportunity for saying unkind things about the moving picture with some justification. Readers of this page and of the editorials for some months past well know that judges, doctors, legislators and others who have unfairly attacked the picture and the picture house have been soundly trounced. Apparently these people do not think it safe to get back at The Moving Picture World, and yet, if they choose to do so, they could refute or rather confute the arguments of those who are defending and upholding the picture by the writings that are published in The Moving Picture World itself.

To wit, brother Hoffman's article on "A Race of Degenerates," to which brother Richardson very properly objected. Then I come to brother Bush. Bush's articles are generally sensible and level-headed. But I venture to think that the opening paragraph of his last week's article on "A Word of Good Cheer" is too much in the nature of a counsel of despair to have the smallest beneficial effect on the progress of the moving picture in public esteem. What Bush says, means, in effect, that no matter how much the moving picture is reviled in the newspapers, from the pulpit, or the bench, no notice should be taken. Turning the other cheek to the smiter is a beautiful piece of beautitudinous religion; but in actual practice it does not work out well.

As a matter of fact, as I and others have pointed out over and over again, the moving picture is on its trial before the public. It has to be defended, and vigorously defended, from the attacks of its many enemies. If you do not enter into a defense, then you allow judgment to go by default. Silence gives consent, consequently the Bush policy of taking no notice and not hitting back would result in permanently degrading the picture in public esteem.

* * *

Take the analogous case of the ordinary stage. We know that attacks on actresses and actors in the theatrical profession generally are fairly common; yet they are never allowed to pass unchallenged or unrebuked. I often read in the pages of the "Dramatic Mirror" articles of a defensive nature, rebuking intemperate utterances in the pulpit. If the Bush theory were carried out in the theatrical world, these libels and uncharitable attacks would remain as permanent stains on the characters of a hard-working body of men and women unable to defend themselves.

I hope brother Bush and brother Hoffman and the rest of the band of writers for this journal see my point, namely, that it is necessary, in defense of the picture, to take up a militant attitude towards its maligners, and that manufacturers, exhibitors and we who are interested in every aspect of the moving picture business, should do nothing, and certainly should not write anything, which would tend to give the enemies of the picture and the picture house the smallest excuse for justifying their uncharitable attacks.

I hope these gentlemen whose writings I am criticising will not misunderstand my motive in choosing their three articles as the text of my sermon for this week. I have had very considerable experience in trade journalism and I know by proved experience that the militant attitude is the one that pays in the long run. That the members of the trade appreciate a disinterested publication which looks after the mutual welfare of its readers and supporters, which defends their business from unjust attacks and does everything in its power to promote the success of that business. That is what The Moving Picture World always does when persons of public prominence like doctors, judges and others, unfairly attack the picture.

We are all in the business for the purpose of exalting it. Let us, then, take every possible step to do so. Why, it is only yesterday since very considerable odium indeed attached to the moving picture and its association. That odium many of us are doing our level best to remove. Evil possibly still exists in various respects and places—evil exists everywhere. But I very much question whether we are likely to diminish what little evil may possibly yet exist by drawing attention to isolated cases.

LIVE WIRE IN COATESVILLE, PA.

The proprietor of the "World-in-Motion," a showhouse in Coatesville, Pa., writes us, taking exception to the remarks about his place by a World reporter. Our representative said that the "World-in-Motion" was housed in a frame building; that the name was not appropriate to a place devoted to cheap vaudeville and only a few pictures, and that the Coatesville folks did not seem to care for vaudeville, as they had to be coaxed in by offering live turkeys."

In reply to this, Mr. W. L. W. Jones, the owner and manager, writes:

"My World-in-Motion is constructed of steel and ~~brick~~, the only thing about the house made of wood being the floor. World-in-Motion has a seating capacity of 639. It is the only house in Coatesville that has conformed with the State law regarding aisles, exits and booth. I have five aisles running the entire length of the house, of 4 feet each, and the center one is 5 feet wide. In front of the house is a 5-foot aisle and in the rear another the same width. I have three fire exits, one 14 feet wide, another 7 feet, and another 12 feet wide. The roof of the World-in-Motion is dome shaped and at the highest point is 35 feet from the floor. The place is ventilated by two 6-foot exhaust fans. There are no posts in the entire building to obstruct the view. Performers have frequently stated that they have never worked in a house that they liked better, as the roof is so arranged as to act like a sounding-board and make it an easy house to work in. The building is not an old one, having been built less than three years ago. The name World-in-Motion was given it when I used three reels of pictures and a song. I now run more pictures than any other place in town, as well as three acts of vaudeville—and it is not so cheap at that. I don't find any real reason why I should change the name. As to giving away turkeys as an inducement for people to come to see the 'cheap vaudeville,' it works out pretty good, as I always have a crowded house when I give away a big, fat, live turkey; and as for coaxing them in, I am being very successful and am glad that I am such a good coaxer. Last week I showed to more than 5,000 people in my house."

So there you have it. The Moving Picture World is sorry that its representative overlooked certain facts, chief of which is that the proprietor of the World-in-Motion is filling his house and consequently making money. We like to hear from successful theater managers. We like to hear that they are filling their houses, and in this case, whether it is the vaudeville, the pictures or the fat turkeys that is the attraction, at least one of them must be good to separate 5,000 people from their money. Managers, you who cannot fill your seats with vaudeville or pictures, or both, "talk turkey." At least it will predispose the farmer in favor of your show. But don't talk too much about the money there is in the scheme, else a turkey trust may be added to your present burdens.

It is now definitely settled that Pathe Freres will erect a producing studio in this country and add American subjects to their already fine program. As to the whereabouts of the studio or the extent of the project no facts have yet been given out for publication.

CHICAGO NOTES.

HELPFUL HINTS TO EXHIBITORS.

By a Picture Lover.

Being a lover of moving pictures, and having been for some time past a reader of your valuable and interesting publication, I wish to give expression to some thoughts that have occurred to me during the last few months, when I have been studying the pictures on the screen. I greatly admire the Moving Picture World for its open policy and its earnest endeavor to improve the moving picture in every possible way. Its pages contain many items that well repay its readers, and many single issues are worth the subscription for a year.

Your representative, "J. M. B." (Mr. Bradlet), certainly made it warm for our Chicago theaters, and they show a good deal of improvement, but he did not make it hot enough for them in some respects. Judged solely from the viewpoint of perfect presentation of the picture itself, there is not one house downtown that does present its pictures as they should be, in every way. I have been in a few of the outlying theaters, some of which run vaudeville, and have found better conditions than in any of the downtown show places. There are several factors in this poor presentation of the pictures which I shall try to set down as they occurred to me. I do not intend to touch on the subject of the music—Mr. Bradlet has thoroughly covered that—but shall confine my remarks to the appearance of the pictures on the screen.

1. Screens.—The screen seems to receive a little less attention than any other part of the equipment for the exhibition of the pictures. It is often found taking the place of a drop curtain where vaudeville is shown, and rolled up and down at least twice at every performance. This alone would not necessarily injure it, but it is often entrusted to careless stagehands, with the result that it becomes wrinkled, wavy, dirty, torn and patched, and altogether unfit to project a good moving picture upon. The way in which so many screens present a wavy surface for the picture to fall upon causes a good deal of distortion, especially apparent to those who are close to it, and often painfully evident when an object in the picture with straight lines, such as a boat or a train, moves across it. And, too, it is often coated with a paint of very coarse grain, which makes the texture of the film seem coarse also, and does much to destroy the sharpness of even the sharpest pictures.

These are all faults which are evident the moment the picture is thrown on a screen which has them, and yet the cost of getting a good screen and keeping it in good condition is not prohibitive.

2. Lighting of the House.—All of the Chicago theaters are lighted houses, being required by city ordinance. But in almost every case the fundamental principles of picture house lighting which have been repeatedly expressed in The World as "the thing to be guarded against, are light striking directly on the screen and light shining directly into the eyes of the audience" seem to be very thoroughly ignored. Some of the theaters here are remarkably light, even to the detriment of the pictures, as the lights are allowed to shine directly on the screen. The result of this brilliant lighting is that all detail is lost in the shadows of the picture, halftones lose their value and the picture has a tendency to become merely a white silhouette. The delicate shadings of a Biograph or Pathe become flat, and the rich soft darks of a sepia-toned Vitagraph become dull, uninteresting patches of a nondescript yellowish-brown.

Very few pictures have the lights and shadows so arranged in them that they can be thrown on a light screen and look at all well. The distinction between white and black on the screen is at best but a relative one, and the more light that shines on the shadows, the less effective the picture becomes.

It seems to me that the theaters could be lighted with some system of indirect lighting, such as has been installed in the Crerar Library and a few other buildings here, and it might pay their managers to study these systems.

3. Operating.—The operators here are mostly good, but a few of them deserve to lose their city licenses. Some of them cannot run their films at anything like the proper rate of speed. Some time ago, in a small theater on Adams street, I saw the beautiful Pathe picture, "In Ancient Greece," actually murdered—there is no other name for it. The film was run through at 30 or 40 per cent. excess speed, and the motions of the dancers could be made out only with difficulty. Being run so fast is not only very hard on the film itself, and the machine as well, but it is very, very hard on the eyes of the people who see it, as a film run so much too fast is never steady. I believe that an unsteady, jerky picture is responsible for more eye strain than any other fault in a picture, due to the constant effort of the eye to follow motion too rapid for it, in the same way that reading on a car causes eye troubles. I believe that the steadiness of a picture has more to do with its effectiveness than anything else, for if it is not steady it can not be clear, though if the picture merely sways in its frame slowly, without any jerks, it does not seem to hurt the eyes; only the picture loses the appearance of stability it has if steady. It seems to me, too, that the size of a picture has little to do with its steadiness; unsteadiness is just as noticeable in an 8-foot picture as it is in one three times as large.

I wish to say a few words about the downtown theaters here. Even the very best of them, the Orpheum, does not put on the picture to the very best advantage. First of all, it is not properly lighted for a picture house; the lights are of high candle power, simply enclosed in ground glass globes, and no attempt is made to shade the screen from their light. It is here that I think a system of indirect lighting referred to above could be used to advantage.

Also, here the relation between the screen and the projector is not what it should be, and the picture on the screen shows a marked degree of distortion. The screen is nearly vertical, while the operating room is far above it, and the picture is thrown downward, the rays striking the screen at a sharp angle. It seems to me that since the Orpheum has adopted the policy of exclusive pictures, and has found it to pay, they could with advantage erect a permanent screen of rigid construction, such as an inclined wall of lath and plaster, coated with a good screen paint, at the proper angle for projecting the picture upon it without distortion. The Orpheum is so well managed, and treats its pictures with so much respect, that I hardly think its manager would hesitate to do everything he could to improve their presentation.

On Madison street the pictures are generally put on badly. Only one of the houses there, the Pastime, puts on the picture in a way similar to the Orpheum as regards size of picture and steadiness; but there are some faults here. The bulbs in the house lights in the front of the house are so low that they shine directly into the eyes of anyone seated in the front of the house and cause eye discomfort. The exit lamps at the sides of the stage cast their red light on the center of the picture, destroying the quality of the dark portions there. There are also some wires strung across the house, in the path of the rays of the lens, which cast a sharp shadow across the upper part of the picture, which generally crosses the faces of the people in the picture and injures the effect of the fine facial expression of the actors in some pictures.

The Alcazar nearly ruins its pictures by allowing all the light from the house lights to shine on the screen, without any attempt to keep the screen in shadow. It seems all the worse because the remedy is so simple: If they would just hang a little piece of metal in front of each light, large enough to cast a shadow covering the screen, their pictures would be improved 50 per cent. They have very fine pictures here, and they are well lighted—if they were not well lighted they would not show at all on the light screen.

The operating room of the Casino is not in the proper relation to the screen for good projection—not all the picture is in clear, sharp focus, the picture is too large for the throw and the screen is in wretched condition.

The Boston runs its pictures so very unsteadily that they are extremely trying to the eyes. Last Saturday I saw the Gaumont picture, "Rabelais' Joke," here on its first run, and it jumped about the screen. Now I know from experience that this could not be blamed on the film. They have good pictures here, too; they do not always have first run, but have films that have shown themselves to be worth seeing the second time, though they ruin their effect by their unsteady projection.

There is no excuse whatever for an unsteady picture; the films and machines now are mechanically perfect enough to show a whole reel of film without more than momentary periods of unsteadiness. But some managers will pay a figure like $100 per week for film service, and then run the films through an old machine that ought to be on the scrap pile, with an operator (?) who seems to have first learned to turn a crank in the sausage making department of a country butcher shop and applied the knowledge gained there to the crank of a moving picture machine—some of them certainly do butcher the films.

And this poor work is made all the more noticeable by contrast to the really good houses which respect their pictures and give the films a chance to show what is in them.

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"The Irish Boy" (Lubin).—Here is a realistic picture that tells a real heart story and brings vividly before the audience the possibilities which open before any young man who chooses to take advantage of them. Here is told very graphically, with a wealth of adequate stage settings and sympathetic acting, the interesting story of a poor Irish emigrant who comes to this country and fights his way to independence and power, making a home for himself, the girl he loves, and his parents. It is neither mawkish nor silly. It is sentimental, but the sentiment is the real heart sort that adds to the interest and holds the attention unbroken from first to last. While it is not a great drama, it holds the interest as thoroughly as anything that has ever come from the Lubin studio.

"In the Frozen North" (Selig).—A master of Western scenes and faithfully depicting Indian character and life, Selig has added another feature to his product which will be certain to please. The frozen North is a region of much romance, the goal of lovers of adventure and the hope of scientific travelers. The drama in the picture is alive with those characteristics which make a picture interesting and is instinct with a heart interest which will appeal strongly to most persons. The scenic features are admirably managed, conveying adequate impressions of the locality and the region depicted. These good points have been emphasized by good photography, the combination making a picture which will linger long in the memory.

"The Love of Lady Irma" (Biograph).—A picture based upon a novel feature. A beautiful woman impulsively engages two thugs to mar her husband's beauty so that she may the more readily retain his love, as he possesses such attractive personal charms that he is a favorite with all women. Then she confesses her fault, but his love stands the test and all trouble is removed. Like all Biograph films, this one has many elements of strength, and the acting is sympathetic and strong, yet aside from this one novel point the drama contains no particular interest. The happy ending is an added feature which helps it.

"The Enchanted Castle" (Kalem).—Here is what might pass for Rostand's famous "Chantecler" transferred to a motion picture film. All the characters in it are animals, and while it is what might be termed a romantic comedy-drama, it will amuse the children as well as the older people. It contains an abundance of humor, not a few thrilling situations, and plenty of life and action, enough, at least, to hold interest at a high level. It is well acted, the staging is adequate, and the photography is clear and even. The company's reputation for excellence will be appreciably enhanced by this picture.

"Frankenstein" (Edison).—Mrs. Shelley's disturbing story, which holds one fascinated even though it has many repulsive situations, is here reproduced in a motion picture in a way that will appeal to those who have never read the story as well as to those who have. It tells of the creation of a monster by one who discovered the mystery of life, and its persistency in dogging its creator's footsteps until dissolution came about through the force of true love. All the repulsive and disagreeable situations are eliminated, and only the dramatic portions are left. These are vividly and sympathetically acted, holding the interest throughout the film. The formation of the monster in that cauldron of blazing chemicals is a piece of photographic work which will rank with the best of its kind. The entire film is one that will create a new impression of the possibilities of the motion picture as a means of expressing dramatic scenes. Sometimes the value of the motion picture in reproducing these stories is scarcely realized, yet they will do much for literature in this direction. Very many, for example, will see this picture who have never read the story, and will acquire a lasting impression of its power.

"Mystery of Temple Court" (Vitagraph).—A drama of power, sympathetically acted, and admirably staged. The Vitagraph players succeed in interpreting these complicated dramatic productions in a way to satisfy the most exacting critic. There is a spirit to their work which can hardly be expressed, yet is plainly apparent when one sees it on the screen.

"The Troubadour" (Pathe).—A fairy story which will please young and old alike. A chief attraction of the Pathe fairy stories is the daintiness with which the details are worked out and the artistic beauty of the settings. This story is admirably told and the fairy scenes interwoven are sufficiently novel to please any audience.

"The Girl and the Fugitive" (Essanay).—As strong and powerful a Western drama as ever released by this firm. There are strong dramatic crises which are developed to the utmost and are made as much of by the capable actors as possible. And there is a dash and go to the entire picture which makes it stirring at times. There is a love story connected with it which gives it a heart interest and serves to develop and maintain a human, not a wholly curious interest. Details are worked out with careful attention. The acting is sympathetic and the photography helps to make it a complete and satisfactory film.

"In the Foothills of Savoy" (Gaumont).—A scenic production which reproduces some of the most picturesque of the famous Savoy hill country, and enables dwellers in distant parts of the world to become familiar with the beauties of that section of France. The operator made his selection with taste and intelligence, and the results of his work are eminently satisfactory.

"A Wilful Dame" (Pathe).—A comedy which develops many amusing and interesting points, offering opportunities for fun and laughter. Some of the situations are extremely amusing.

"Wild Birds' Haunts" (Pathe).—A film of the educational order, admirably photographed and faithfully reproducing scenes of interest. The work of this sort done by Pathe can scarcely be overestimated. Travel is eliminated and the scenes which are depicted are made plain enough to make them clearly understood. It is well worth while for motion picture producers to bring to the unfortunate portion of the world unable to view these scenes themselves the interesting scenery from all over the world. Such bits of graphic information as are contained in films of this type are valuable contributions to the general stock of knowledge.

"Courting the Widow" (Vitagraph).—A picture perhaps sufficiently well described in its title. As may be imagined, it affords opportunity for endless combinations and difficulties, all of an amusing character. And the Vitagraph actors make the most of these chances, developing much fun as the story proceeds. The acting is excellent, and the photography is clear and good.

"A Mother's Heart" (Lubin).—A graphic representation of a little domestic tragedy which arose through a misunderstanding. Jealousy overpowered the good sense of a wife who left home and obtained a position as a governess. Through the little boy of whom she has charge her own son is invited to visit there and a reunion of the family follows. This film is interesting because of what it suggests, that frequently supposed causes for jealousy are baseless and arise through misapprehensions. Possibly others could be adjusted quite as easily as this one if the proper means were provided.

"A Woman's Repentance" (Pathe).—A beautifully wrought out version of the tale of the country maiden who leaves her honest lover because of the wiles of some other polished fellow from the city. There is a difference in details, however, because in this instance the deserted lover falls and hurts his head, so he becomes insane. In this plight, through a fall, he is discovered by the young woman, who leaves her city friend and carefully nurses the unfortunate young man back to life. It is made extremely interesting by the acting and the mechanical perfection of the film. It is, perhaps, an almost new picture because of this fact and there is more than one who will feel a thrill of pity for the unfortunate country boy and will rejoice with him when at last the tangled paths are all made straight. These simple heart stories are strongly told and appeal to the emotions more than some of the more elaborate stories do.

"The Village Inventor" (Selig).—A romance of the old-fashioned type with the country boy suddenly lifted into fame and fortune by an invention which wins him the favor of a rich man whose daughter he marries. It is a fateful day for the country boy, however, and eventually he is deserted and makes his way back to his country home and the simple hearted little girl he left behind. Down the vista of the years one's imagination wanders and sees many such instances, or similar ones, eventually, perhaps, recognizing the futility of such weddings. The story is well told, the acting being sympathetic and intelligent. The mechanical qualities of the film would be hard to improve.

"A Western Romance" (Edison).—A romance full of the snap and go of the plains, yet made even more interesting by the love story which is interwoven, supplying a deep heart interest. Not always are clauses in wills imposing matrimonial alliances so literally consummated as this one, but it was not the girl's fault. She resisted as long as she could, but when her betrothed won her affections under an assumed name, what was she to do? Real cowboys and real Indians were employed in the production of this film, contributing materially to the interest which it excites. The rescue by the young woman is a thrilling bit of acting, and adds much to the interest of the picture. One's interest is maintained throughout, and there are many little touches which do much to heighten the effect and increase the general attractiveness of the film. Western dramas, or those depicting with accuracy life and conditions on the plains, are popular favorites and this house is to be congratulated for adding another of such excellence to the list.

"The Man with the Weak Heart" (Edison).—A choice bit of irony is apparent in this picture. A doctor informs a gentleman that he has a weak heart, and must not exert himself. But as he walks slowly along meditating upon his probable uneventful life he is suddenly confronted with numerous conditions which lead to the exertion of prodigious strength. When he arrives home, however, he is too weak to take the baby and the family rush hither and thither ministering to his wants. Perhaps the producer intended no irony, but it is evident just the same, and adds much to the interest of the film.

"The Girl and the Bandit" (Kalem).—A melodramatic story of how a girl single-handed captured a noted desperado for whom a large reward had been offered. It has a swing and dash to it which makes it interesting, and this is enhanced by the setting, which is in the beautiful outdoor scenery of Florida.

"The Hand of Uncle Sam" (Essanay).—A lively story, with much of the melodrama about it, based upon the supposed interest of an American in one of the vest-pocket republics of South America. It is chiefly interesting because of the opportunity it affords of learning how the hand of Uncle Sam can reach forth and snatch a man from before the rifles of the firing squad. The picture of the torpedo-boat destroyer coming down on the camera under full head of steam is thrilling. The closing scene, where the condemned man is restored to his wife's arms, with the American flag waving above them, arouses strong emotions. Altogether it is a satisfactory picture and will be seen with interest anywhere.

"The Wild Coast of Belle Isle" (Gaumont).—A beautifuliy photographed picture of a wild coast, representing very graphically the rocky headlands and the waves dashed into foam as they beat ceaselessly against the rocks. The operator made selections of viewpoints which convey the impression of grandeur and power. These scenic films, particularly those containing reproductions of breaking waves, are always popular, and where the technical work is as well done as it was in this instance the attractiveness of the picture is greatly enhanced.

"Capital vs. Labor" (Vitagraph).—The chief interest in this picture will center in the scenes depicting a strike and the riotous work of a mob. It is much too realistic to be comfortable. It gives a graphic representation of mob violence when unrestrained. It is a good bit of acting when the young minister rushes in, calms the mob, obtains concessions from the capitalist and in reality saves the day for everybody. The soldier with his regiment arrives too late to be of service. Perhaps the picture will have a salutary influence during this season when strikes pervade the air and from almost every section of the country comes talk of industrial complaint.

"The Horseshoe" (Pathe).—A pretty fairy story, telling how a horseshoe, presented by Cupid, rescues a beautiful princess from the boredom of loneliness and secures a prince a beautiful wife. It is all worked out with careful attention to details and with the mechanical perfection of the Pathe films.

"A Maid of the Mountains" (Urban).—A drama of interest, with a setting of romantic scenery, well acted and beautifully photographed. Like all the pictures that come from this house it has numerous excellencies, and these will be found quite up to the Urban standard.

"Over the Appennines in Italy" (Urban).—One of those delightful scenic films, photographed with an appreciation of the possibilities of the subject which brings out the best there is in it. Mountain scenery is difficult to render, since it is often impossible to reproduce the impression of the grandeur of the cliffs and mountain-sides. But in this instance the operator has accurately interpreted the impressions exerted by mountains and has succeeded in producing an unusually interesting picture. The technical work on the film was well done and the entire picture will be certain to please.

"Faithful" (Biograph).—Few, indeed, are they who have too faithful and zealous friends, but the hero of this picture seems to be one of the sort that is unfortunate in this respect. True, his faithful adherent is only half witted, which in the nature of things makes his attentions somewhat unwelcome. After resorting to all sorts of schemes to rid himself of his follower, he finally decides to make the best of it and permit the devotion to continue unmolested. At last the psychological moment arrives. The friend that is determined to stand by is there and carries John's erstwhile sweetheart from the burning house. Then his worth is recognized. The lovers settle their differences and everybody lives happily ever after. The acting is quite in harmony with the subject and the photography is clear and of good tonal quality.

INDEPENDENT FILMS

"A Family Feud" (Lux).—A story of a courtship between a son and daughter of two men sworn to maintain a family feud. It has some dramatic scenes and the acting is quite in sympathy with the subject. The photography has a few weak places, but they are of minor importance and could be easily corrected.

"The Tenderfoot" (Nestor).—A Western story, based upon a complication brought about by an outlaw holding up a tenderfoot ranch owner, stealing his money and deeds and impersonating him at the ranch, where he was unknown. It worked well until a girl discovered the situation and set about straightening it out, which she succeeded in doing to the satisfaction of everyone. There is an abundance of drama in the story, and the interest is well sustained. It is worthy of note that the story is told without the taking of a life, though guns are often in evidence.

"The Sea's Vengeance" (Ambrosio).—A story based upon a lover's desertion and his death by drowning in answer to a supposed curse. The scene where the sea is dashing against the rocks is wild and convincing. A feeling of sorrow is given to the picture by the desertion of one girl, the grief of another and the death of the faithless lover.

"The Lover's Embarrassment" (Eclair).—Not every lover admits to stealing a large number of chickens because he wants to shield the girl he was visiting, but here is one that accepts that as an alternative to the true explanation of his presence. Fortunately for him the real thieves are captured and brought back with the evidence of their crime with them, while the young woman's mother speedily discovered the true explanation of the young man's presence. Thus are matters made straight and the young hearts made happy. The film turns upon this novel proposition which adds interest to it and keeps the audience wondering what will be the result. It is sympathetically acted and adequately staged.

"Honesty, Its Own Reward" (Eclair).—A pathetic story of an old man who finds a purse, from which two dollars have fallen, which he is accused of stealing. Happily, however, he is released from his unpleasant predicament by the timely arrival of two nuns, who have found the missing money. The unfeeling owner of the purse goes her way without as much as thanking the poor old man for returning it. The nuns take pity upon him, however, and see that he is supplied with the necessities, which to him are comforts and luxuries. The only criticism one might offer upon this film is that it is too true to life. Far too many people are quite as thoughtless and apparently hardhearted as this woman. Perhaps films like this will perform a real service by pointing out what it may mean to another to be so unthinking.

"His Sick Friend" (Imp).—All sorts of pictures and stories have been worked out of this subject, leaving the young wife at home while the husband goes to a poker game. Perhaps some young wives have also fixed up the room to make the husband believe that she, too, had been enjoying herself, but it is safe to say that probably few, if, indeed, any wife ever had her husband lift the table cloth and pull from under the table a man whom she did not know was there. This turns the tables and she is forced to admit what sort of a trick she had played. Of course the husband forgives her for the presence of the man. This denouement makes the picture a distinctive piece of comedy work. It is admirably acted and clearly photographed.

"Stung" (Imp).—It may, perhaps, be imagined what a predicament a man could be put in if he was suddenly called to supper in a company and had his shoe off. And it would be worse if his rival in the young woman's affections had purloined the shoe. Here is the whole comical complication admirably worked out. Perhaps the best part of it is the pretended clairvoyance by which the missing shoe is discovered in the rival's pocket. The acting is alive and there is a series of amusing complications which keeps the audience laughing most of the time. The photography is clear, even in some of the more difficult scenes. Altogether it is a satisfactory picture.

"The Man from Texas" (Bison).—Many times the well acted Western pictures put out by this company have been commended, but one feels like making an exception in this case. There is entirely too much gun play, and while it may be justifiable when considered in one way, it doesn't seem necessary to reproduce all the gruesome details of murder. Self defense may be a good reason, but the representation of the taking of a life is not elevating nor is it needed to make the pictures interesting. All this can be suggested. It has been suggested in other pictures and the interest did not suffer. This company has done so well heretofore that it seems too bad to have its work marred by objectionable scenes of this character.

"A Mexican's Ward" (Bison).—A stirring drama, or melodrama, which is based upon the treachery of a faithless guardian. The action is all life and the scenes are produced with an accurate attention to detail and a careful working out of the plot which adds much to the interest. The photography is an advance on some of the work previously done by this company and represents a gratifying degree of progress.

"The Theft of Diamonds" (Great Northern).—This firm has made an attractive feature of films of this type in the past, its Sherlock Holmes series being graphic representatives of this fact. In this film some very dramatic situations are reproduced and the acting is so sympathetic and the actors develop so much capability in developing their parts that the audience becomes absorbed in the picture and regrets when it closes. There is always a more than ordinary degree of interest attaching to a story of this sort, and in this instance the audience is not disappointed in the way it is worked out.

"A Quiet Honeymoon" (Great Northern).—An uproariously funny film, which depicts in a very graphic way the difficulties of an unfortunate couple in trying to enjoy their honeymoon. It is worked out with all the firm's careful attention to details, while the actors perform their parts in a way that entitles them to praise for their work. It is a comedy well worth including in a program.

"The Betraying Mirror" (Itala).—A dramatic story of more than ordinary interest, showing the ingratitude of a faithless nephew. The scene where the discovery is made in the mirror is one of unusual strength and creates much interest. Actors and photographer have performed their parts well, and the result is a picture which will please any audience.

"John Hardy's Invention" (Powers).—A romance woven around the work of an inventor. A flying machine fails to fly, but a hair pin invented by a woman brings a substantial check. There is an exhibition of jealousy on the part of a husband, who persists in misconstruing things and will not listen to explanations. The story is well told, the acting is lively and sympathetic and there is the accompaniment of good photography to assist in maintaining interest. The Powers pictures are improving steadily, each one showing an advance over the previous one.

"St. Elmo" (Thanhouser).—The second release of a new house, and, unlike some producers', the second was better than the first. It was not what might be termed an engaging story which this firm undertook to present. The play is based upon Augusta Evans Wilson's novel of the same name. It is a religious novel and the dramatic company which has tried to play it has failed to satisfy in all places with one exception. Of course the film is an improvement over the spoken drama, since it is shortened and only the interesting scenes are retained. While the writer has no particular liking for either the story or the drama, he has no fault to find with the reproduction here. It is better than the drama because it eliminates much that is dreary and practically unnecessary to make the story comprehensible and leaves only the better and stronger scenes. The acting is sympathetic and the photographer has performed his part satisfactorily.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA.

We have been favored with a private exhibition of this special two-reel subject which is being issued under the cooperation of the licensed manufacturers. The photography is wonderfully good considering the disadvantages and the several thousand feet of negative has been pruned and trimmed by Pathe Freres until there is not an uninteresting foot in the two reels. Without a doubt it is the most expensive negative ever printed from and the American public are indebted to the licensed manufacturers who made it possible for the film to be issued and to the brave and enterprising photographer, Cherry Kearton, who secured the negatives at great bodily risk and inconvenience. On another page we give a synopsis of the scenes and a few reproductions taken from sections of the film. This subject is open to all licensed theaters and will prove a big drawing card. Exchanges, in ordering, should specify sets and not films, as the subject consists of two reels. One order came to Pathe Freres for two films. This is vague and may be taken for one each of the two reels comprising the subject or two complete copies. The date of release is April 18.

FRANK WINCH CLIMBS THE LADDER.

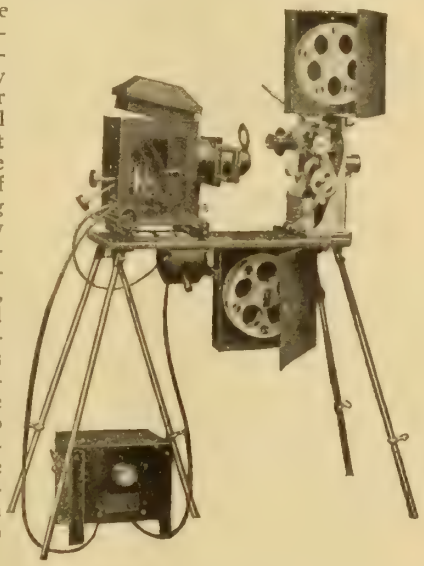
The genial New York representative of the "Billboard" has resigned that position to act as press representative of the Buffalo Bill Wild West and Pawnee Bill's Far East shows. Our contemporary loses a good man and his new employers made a wise selection. Not yet thirty years old, Frank Winch has seen more of life and held more important positions than few men live to do. He was born in San Francisco in 1881, received a college education and started work as a bellboy. His cleverness with the pen drew him into newspaper work and as a reporter he had varied experiences that brought fame if not fortune. He next essayed the work of the theatrical press agent, and not only wrote plays but had them produced. He managed several stock companies, and in 1908 came to New York as manager of the Eastern office of the "Billboard." Here he has made many friends, not a few of them among the moving picture people, who will miss him at their confabs, but who will all wish him success in his new sphere, as is the wish of The Moving Picture World.

J. C. Doyle, proprietor of the Johnson Opera House, Seneca Falls, N. Y., has operated his moving picture lamp with an Economy Coil for several months. He ordered a "Hallberg" Economizer about three weeks ago in trade for the Economy Coil, and in a letter under date of March 15 he writes: "I thought I had a good light before, but know now I was mistaken." The above speaks well for the good light obtained from the "Hallberg" Economizer.

EDISON IMPROVED UNDERWRITER'S MODEL "B"

The Latest Evolution in Projecting Machines.

For the past three months the Edison Manufacturing Company has had a representative on the road, Mr. F. H. Stewart, demonstrating their latest creation in the projecting line—the New Underwriter's Model "B" Kinetoscope. The tour so far has been emphatically successful, the strong, appealing points of the new machine winning for it friends wherever it has been demonstrated. The plan followed by Mr. Stewart has been to secure a theater centrally located in each of the larger cities and to issue invitations to proprietors and managers in and around the city to attend the demonstration, given always in the morning. As a result of the demonstrations the dealers are clinching several good sales on the spot and are assured by many exhibitors present of their intention to install the Model "B" as soon as practicable. A demonstration was given on February 3 at the Majestic Theater, 52 South Pearl street, Albany, N. Y., through the kindness of Mr. Emil Deches, manager, which was attended by exhibitors from Albany, Schenectady, Troy, Cohoes and neighboring cities. After the demonstration the Actograph Company, of Albany, ordered two machines from the factory by long distance telephone for two of the exhibitors present.



Feeling that the trade generally will be interested to learn something about the new product of the inventor of the kinetoscope and his experts, we present a cut of the machine and a brief summary of some of its talking points. On this new machine the Edison experts have been working for over a year, during which period one, who is at all acquainted with the class of mechanics and artisans with whom the "Wizard of Menlo Park" surrounds himself, can well imagine that they have discovered many features in which it was possible to improve their previous model.

The latest improvements in the Edison Model "B" have increased its attractiveness as well as its efficiency and durability. The metal mechanism support is now nickel-plated instead of being finished in black Japan, as are also the cranks, adjusting lever, stereopticon slide and rod, mechanism thumb screws and all gears and pinions on the right frame side. In short, nickel has been substituted for Japan finish wherever it was possible to do so. This ornamentation is a most decided improvement in the appearance of the new model.

The Edison Kinetoscope has always been noted for the remarkable steadiness of its projection, and it is claimed that the new model is an improvement even in this respect. The durability and efficiency of the machine have been increased by the use of hardened and tempered tool steel for the star wheel, one pin cam, picture gauge, all bearings and end of star wheel shaft and cam shaft. The cam is accurately ground and massive in construction. The only part that is susceptible to wear is the pin, which can be readily removed and replaced at an insignificant cost. The three sprockets are now made of polished steel, the upper and take-up ones being flanged, thus preventing the film from running off. These sprockets are guaranteed to be absolutely accurate and mechanically perfect. The old-style rubber rollers have been replaced by polished steel tension rollers for all sprockets. The new rollers are made of case hardened steel, in three parts, the flanges of which revolve independently of each other as well as of the roller between, thereby preventing all drag on the film. With all these improvements, the mechanism cannot cause scratches or "rain storms," the only part of the film in actual contact with the mechanism being the margin outside of the picture.

The Edison Kinetoscope automatic shutter is a great improvement over every other similar device. Under no possible conditions can the light be thrown upon the film except when the film is in motion. When the shutter is wide open it automatically locks so that no power is required to keep it open, thus eliminating any undue wear on the gearing and causing easier operation of mechanism. When the speed of the machine falls below a certain point, however, it automatically unlocks and closes, so that the film is at no time endangered.

The take-up attachment is a distinguishing feature of the Edison machine ,it being so constructed as to admit of its being placed either below the base board or in front of the mechanism, to meet the varying conditions or the whim of the operator. This is an entirely new idea in take-up attachments. An automatic belt tightener is provided which insures an equal tension on the belt under all conditions. It prevents the loss of the lower loop between intermittent and take-up sprockets. For rewinding film an improved rewinder is supplied to accommodate reels up to 12 inches. This device is provided with a clamp and thumb screw for instant adjustment to any base board, shelf or table.

The lamp house, with its sliding device for stereopticon purposes, is simple, durable and efficient. It is of ample proportions to give sufficient ventilation and heat radiation. The lamp has all hand wheel adjustments and is substantially built. It has the approval of all Boards of Fire Underwriters.

The condensing lenses are the best obtainable, being made of an imported French optical glass. The magazine is made to take reels up to 12 inches in diameter, a larger reel than can be used with any other type of projecting machines.

A big, appealing feature of the Edison Kinetoscope is its accessibility, which permits the repair or replacement of any of its parts at a minimum of labor and expense. Its parts are made to gauge and are consequently interchangeable. Any number of Edison machines, it is claimed, can be dismantled, their parts scattered in a confused heap and reassembled into machines of absolute mechanical precision. The question of accessibility and interchangeability of parts is a point worthy of serious consideration by every exhibitor when purchasing a machine.

LUBIN NOTES.

One contributor to the Lubin Manufacturing Company developed a new idea recently when he sent in a story with the announcement that it had been sent to several concerns. "The story will go to the firm making the highest bid on or before March 10," was the announcement, and added information was to the effect that already one $100 offer had been received. That ante was not raised: the story being of the boldest sort.

Exhibitors have been unusually appreciative of "The District Attorney," and letters of congratulation have been received in quantities. That the appreciation is sincere is attested by the number of orders for extra prints, the standing orders not sufficing to fill the demand from exhibitors for the subject.

The Lubin release for April 11 is notable in that it carries three strong comedy subjects on the same reel and yet runs only 990 feet. The three topics are so entirely different that there is no confliction and the reel is one of the best comedy offerings put out in a long time.

Talking of pending releases, the Lubin directors are priding themselves upon the fact that they have brought out a story in which two sisters from the country come to the city and neither goes wrong. From time immemorial it has seemed fatal to the morals of one of the two to come to the city since dramatic contrast must be provided. Here the directors find the dramatic contrast and yet contrive a reasonable and happy ending. The story is "First Love Is Best," which is released April 7.

St. Patrick's Day was one of the Lubin release days and their "The Irish Boy" seemed to be just what was wanted. One exchange wrote for three extra prints and later telegraphed for four more, and most of the exchanges came in for at least one extra print. Memorial Day is another regular Lubin release day for which special preparation is being made.

The ending of the Philadelphia car strike and the general sympathetic strike will enable work to be rushed on the new plant of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, work on which was interrupted for two weeks, and early occupancy is anticipated. The photographic reproductions of the new plant recently published have attracted widespread attention.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Let me impress upon writers that they must be very careful to send complete data when asking questions. Better tell too much than not enough. Give make and model of machine, size of picture, kind of screen, length of throw, size of connecting wires, etc., etc. To illustrate: A few days since the question was asked, "What can I do to prevent my condensers breaking?" Not a word as to kind of condenser mount or lamp-house, fans in operating room, open window behind machine, etc., etc. I could make no intelligent answer. Make your data complete and I will try to help you.

A Hard One.—Manager, in Iowa, writes as follows: Am using, in one of our theaters, a ——— machine, and every picture thrown on the screen is blurred. That is to say, the blur occurs when objects are in motion. For example, in the film, "The Last Deal," a Biograph, when the card game is on, the picture is clear and sharp—in fact, all that could be asked in a first-class projected picture. But as soon as anyone, or any object, moves about, or moves in any way, that especial object immediately becomes blurred. This does not occur at the sides or center, as would be the case were the film bulging over the aperture, but all over the entire screen. Still I do think the film does bulge and have done everything under the sun to remedy the defect, but can't seem to overcome it. My pictures are so clear otherwise that very few have commented on it, probably thinking it should be so. But I know it should not, and it has worried me nearly sick. Hoping you will be able to give me information enabling me to overcome the fault, I am, sincerely, ———.

This letter is so interesting that I print it in full, inviting any of my readers who may have had similar experience, if any there be, to send in a solution. Frankly, it has made me take to the tall timber. I cannot even imagine anything that would produce any such weird effect as this. If the figures are perfectly clear while still, they should also be while moving. There might be some figures blurred by reason of too rapid motion, but, as I understand it, all moving objects are blurred in this case, and it occurs, not in some films, but all the time. I present it to our readers as a case so queer as to be wellnigh a curiosity. Sorry to say I cannot even make an intelligent guess as to its cause, therefore know no remedy.

Film Jumps. Shadows.—Charles Town, W. Va., says his film jumps once in a while and there are occasional dark shadows just the same as when the shutter is out of time. Asks reason.

From your description I would say that the film jumps when a bad patch goes through, or there is some other fault in the film itself. The trouble is, I am quite sure, in the film itself and not in the machine. As to the shadows: The shutter being out of time does not cause dark shadows, but does cause a "travel ghost," the same being flashes of white up or down from any white object, particularly from letters in a title. The same effect is had, much exaggerated, when the shutter is removed entirely. No, the trouble is not in the condenser lenses. I shall have to have a more minute description of the "dark shadow" effect to answer you definitely. For one thing, note if these shadows appear only when you run at low speed. I await further information.

A Bunch of Questions.—Roxbury, Mass., writes: (1) Would like to know cause of picture being out of focus on each change of scene. (2) Why do carbons get red-hot when all connections are tight? (3) What size condenser lenses should I have for a 16 x 19 picture at 78 feet, alternating current? Now using one 6½ and one 7½, but they crack frequently. (4) Have Power's rheostat, and after checking three coils connected in multiple with a non-adjustable it shows no increase in light. The fourth coil increases the light, but can't hold it there as it heats up. (5) Have a Mullen coil which was used on 110-volt, 60-cycle current. Current has been changed to 60-cycle and now coil heats up. What is cause and is any change in coil necessary? (6) What causes top of picture to cut off on a slant while bottom is level? (7) Am drawing only 40 amperes, yet blow 60-ampere fuses almost every day. What is cause? (8) What causes light to form similar to a figure eight at times? (9) Would like to know how to make the thing which takes the place of the hand in front of hood in changing slides. It is made of film cut in a certain way and thickness and placed in a brass piece.

(1) From what you say in another portion of your letter your screen is placed in a different position in setting the stage. This might affect your picture focus if the movement be very much. Sometimes different scenes in a film will require different focusing owing to some technical peculiarity in photographing, but an unsharp positive cannot be corrected in the projecting machine. (2) I take it you mean that the carbons get red-hot at contact with carbon arms. This is because the carbon is not making good contact with the metal. Clean out inside of arms with a file, dressing them up, if necessary, until good contact is had with carbon entire width of the arm. (3) You are using a 4-inch projection lens, and two 7½-inch condenser lenses will just suit that length of projection lens. (4) Don't understand! Send in sketch of your connections. (5) No change should be necessary unless the voltage has been increased. If so, the coil would be too small. Perhaps it has deteriorated through age. (6) May be that light is striking top of lens hole in wall of operating room. That is most likely explanation. (7) If you really are drawing but 40 amperes, it is likely you have a ground, and a heavy one at that, somewhere. (8) I think you must mean the light at the spot. It is caused by arc being too long. (9) You are too many for me, old man. Never saw the device you name. Think you must have seen something made from colored gelatine paper. A sort of colored shutter. You are at liberty to send in all the questions you may wish—that is what the department is for—but be very careful to make them perfectly plain so that I may understand what you are driving at. It puzzled me considerably to make out what you had in mind in some of those submitted this time, and one (No. 4) I could make nothing of at all.

Stereopticon.—Indianapolis, Ind., asks how much current should be used on a dissolver lamp. Also whether or no the lamp-houses could not just as well be set side by side as one on top of the other.

The amount of current you should use will depend on circumstances. With alternating, more should be used than with direct current. The more current you use, the brighter will be your picture, of course; but, on the other hand, there is greater liability of slide breakage with strong light. With direct current, 18 amperes is enough for the stereo, unless the picture be a very large one, when it may be increased to 25. Eighteen amperes D. C. gives a soft, beautiful projection and a picture which is by many preferred to the brighter one. When running travelogue slides, which must remain in the light for some length of time, never use more than 18 amperes. Stereopticons should have an adjustable rheostat with a range from 15 to 25 amperes. Then by cutting down the current when the chorus slide of a song comes on, it will not be broken; also you may reduce current whenever you have a very slow song or travelogue slides. The lamp-houses may be set side by side, but it would be a very unhandy and impracticable arrangement for the operator, since he would then be obliged to reach clear over the nearer lamp-house to change the slides in the other, or to trim his lamp. There would be no difference at all in the result on the screen.

Lens, Screen, Lights.—Mt. Clemens, Mich., asks: (1) If Darlot lens is the best make? (2) If machine being 15 feet above center of screen, 65-foot throw, will affect picture to any extent as regards its uniformity of size, and, if so, what is remedy? What size picture gives best results at 65 feet? What color lights to use in auditorium when picture is on, and whether or no there is any law to prevent a manager enforcing a house rule requiring ladies to remove their headgear?

The Darlot lens is a most excellent article, but for obvious reasons it is not the office of this department to compare different makes of lenses, machines or other goods. Darlot lenses are imported from France and kept in stock by all leading supply houses. The Gundlach-Manhattan Company, of Rochester, N. Y., make an excellent projection lens. (2) The machine being 15 feet above screen will, of course, have a tendency to make the picture a trifle wider at the base. At 65 feet I think there would be very little distortion—not enough to be easily discernible. The remedy is to tilt the screen to face the lens squarely. If your picture is in focus all over the screen, I think, in your case, this need not be done. Fairly good pictures are often projected at an angle of as much as 25 degrees; in a few cases even more. Specially ground lenses may be had for this purpose, but they are expensive and not desirable except in extreme cases. Size of picture, at 65 feet or any other distance, will depend on the size of the house, etc. In general, a picture 18 feet wide is large enough for any theater, and one 12 feet wide is small enough for any but very small houses. Any range between is excellent. The larger your picture the less brilliant it will be with a given amount of light. Use green lights near the curtain and yellow or white (shaded, of course, from the screen and the eyes of the spectators) in the auditorium. No, there is no law to prevent the enforcement of a "ladies remove their hats" house rule! Were such a law passed, the courts could not and would not uphold it.

Here Is a Corker.—Middleport, Ohio, writes: What makes certain makes of films jump all the way through: Certain makes jump very bad, while the rest run perfectly steady. Pictures are from one to four weeks old. What causes dimness on each side of screen, about one foot on each side; picture 8 x 10?

As regards the films jumping, you can search me, my dear sir! The way you put it is a poser, for all the manufacturers claim they are the producers of the steadiest running film on the market. In general the jumping of film is caused (a) by uneven perforation, (b) by loose intermittent movement, (c) by worn sprocket teeth, (d) by old, shrunken film. But as you have named some of the best running film as jumping badly and some that jumps badly as running smooth, I am totally at loss to reply intelligently. Dimness may be caused by light striking sides of lens holes in operating room wall; by too narrow a spot; by fault in lens; by fault in screen itself. Would have to have very accurate description of the trouble to reply further. It may be your projection lens is dirty inside—the glasses, I mean. The projection lens must be kept perfectly clean.

OPERATING ROOM VENTILATION.

By F. H. Richardson.

Summer time approaches, and with it comes stifling heat in poorly ventilated operating rooms, especially those of the "cracker-box" variety. Now, Mr. Manager, you wouldn't like to be cooped up with a hot lamp-house by your side when the thermometer is a hundred in the shade, would you, with little or no ventilation except that furnished by a more or less efficient electric fan, useful only to blow the superheated air around the room? Of course you would not. Therefore, remember the Golden Rule and proceed to get busy. If your house is but one story you can easily install a 12 to 24-inch vent pipe running from center of operating room ceiling to above the roof. This will not only carry off the hot air, but will carry off the smoke in case of fire. If the installation of such a pipe is impossible by reason of stories above your theater, you may easily, if there be stove flues, connect them to the operating room, near the ceiling, with ordinary stovepipe with riveted joints. This will help amazingly. You should remember that your operator is human and stands the same chance we all do of plenty of roasting when he has departed from this world. It is scarcely the thing to toast him here and in the future, too. It isn't a square deal! At best an operating room isn't desirable as a Summer resort during the hot season, but it may be made fairly comfortable, nevertheless, providing there is the will to do it.

GREAT DEMONSTRATION IN CLEVELAND.

Just as we go to press we receive notice of a great educational, free exhibition of motion pictures, given in Cleveland, by the Lake Shore Film Exchange. The proprietor of the Hippodrome placed that magnificent auditorium at their disposal, and among the 2,000 people who attended by special invitation were teachers, students, doctors and, in fact, all the gentry of Cleveland. A selection of educational pictures were shown, consisting of 15 Urban-Eclipse subjects, 3 Pathe, 1 Biograph, 1 Edison, 1 Essanay and 1 Selig. Universal praise was bestowed on the subjects and the demonstration will be followed by others. This is certainly good missionary work and we commend the example set by the Lake Shore Film and Supply Company to exchanges in other territories.

KINEMACOLOR IN GERMANY.

A display of Kinemacolor was given on March 4, in Dusseldorf, before several hundred scientists, artists, photographic experts and theater owners. Among those present was Mr. Paul Leisegang, the art and color expert and author, and his opinion may be taken as a concensus of the others. Mr. Leisegang, whose name is well known to scientific workers the world over, expressed himself as being deeply impressed by the richness, deepness and brightness of the colors, the natural aspect of faces, flesh tints, animal, flower and other subjects.

From a practical point it is worthy of mention that Kinemacolor is the daily leading attraction in the Theater-Betriebs-Gesellschaft, in Dusseldorf, and the director, Carl Lobse, is enthusiastic in its praise and says that it attracts many people who would not attend an ordinary performance. A company has been formed to present Kinemacolor in the principal theaters of the leading German cities.

OHIO NOTES.

Cleveland, Ohio.—The Grand Central Theater, located on Central avenue, this city, has been purchased by W. H. Bunning, a well-known amusement promoter. Business at the Grand Central is on the increase since Mr. Bunning has taken charge of this popular playhouse. The theater runs three reels of licensed films, and illustrated songs, and under his able management this house is likely to have a long and prosperous career. W. H. Arndt, a member of Local No. 160, Operators' Union, of Cleveland, is chief electrician at this theater.

The Elite Theater, which has been one of Cleveland's popular picture houses, has been closed during the past week to vacate room for other purposes.

The American Theater, one of Cleveland's most up-to-date, exclusive picture houses, on Superior avenue, which has formerly been under the management of William Bullock, the well-known film producer, is now under the able and successful management of Mrs. Esther R. Baird. Mrs. Baird has devoted the past five years to the theatrical business, and has successfully managed several of Ohio's most up-to-date theaters. Mrs. Baird is to be congratulated for the success of the American in the past two years, as she makes it her policy to give the patrons of this theater the latest and most interesting licensed film subjects. This theater has a seating capacity of 600. A new Power's No. 6 machine has been installed in the past week, with a throw of 120 feet, giving a 10 x 14 picture.

W. C. Kunzmann, the Moving Picture World correspondent and representative of Jeffries-Johnson fight slide views, Cleveland, Ohio, with headquarters at 1830 East 19th street, reports big rush for these slides. Enterprising picture theater managers in Cleveland and vicinity are taking advantage of this big feature, as the slides have packed these houses whenever they have been exhibited. Be one of the first to show them to your patrons in your city.

W. O. Sommers, manager of the Park Theater, Starkweather avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, has closed a contract with the Western Vaudeville Exchange, this city, to furnish him with four up-to-date vaudeville acts for remainder of season.

Managers V. O. Woodward, of the Sandusky Theater, and Chas. Reack, Theatorium, Sandusky, Ohio, report tremendous business. Both these theaters show all late subject licensed films, and are packing them in nightly. Feature novelties twice a week at these theaters seem to take with their patrons.

The Paramount Film Exchange, 61 West 14th street, New York, have an opening for a good solicitor who is experienced in the film business.

THAT'S WHY Manager E. S. THAT'S WHY the manager of the Virginia Theatre of Chicago, writes, Sept. 14, 1909: "Have given Motiograph a thorough try-out to date, eight months, and have found it will stand up to anything required of it, and is as near devoid of flicker as is possible.

A VALUABLE IMPROVEMENT IN MOTION PICTURE MACHINES FOR WHICH A PATENT HAS BEEN GRANTED.

An improvement called the Motiograph Quick Rewind is an original, new and novel arrangement for which a United States letters patent has been granted to Mr. Roebuck, president and manager of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, of Chicago. We are advised that nothing that approaches this improvement is to be found in any other machine.

Figure No. 1 represents the magazines in position for running the film through the machine. The dotted lines in the same figure represent the position of the magazine and film when being rewound.

Figures No. 3 and No. 4 represent the crank connection.

Figure No. 5 represents a side view of the rewind gearing and connections; also showing the arrangement for revolving the magazines.

It is a very great improvement over any other film-winding mechanism, in that the film is wound direct from the main crank handle, which is in the most convenient and comfortable location for the operator, besides which the greater sweep of the handle makes it possible to rewind without fatigue, and by the power being communicated to the opposite side of the machine in order to reach the reel arbor, the magazine may be located with door toward the operator, an advantage that is highly prized by every operator of experience. One of the great advantages claimed for this rewind as compared with others is that the location of the crank handle is on a line with the elbow of the operator, which is the easiest position for the arm, besides which the sweep of the crank is double that used on other forms of rewind, a further disadvantage of which is that other rewinds are placed on a line with the operator's face. It is claimed by the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company that the winding or the films with the original form or rewind is exceedingly tiresome, and many of the motion picture machines are not arranged so it is convenient to rewind the films without removing the reels from the magazines and winding them on a rewind mechanism separate and apart from the machine. It is claimed that it is a pleasure to rewind with the Motiograph rewind. To shift the connection between the crank and the reel arbor, all that is necessary is to press a spring plunger at the right of the crank boss of the main frame, turn the crank slightly, pull it towards you about one-quarter of an inch and the spring bolt will automatically drop into the other groove and hold the crank in place for rewinding the film. When the film has been wound back on the upper reel, press the spring plunger and return the crank to its normal position. When using this form of reeling mechanism in combination with fireproof film magazines, it is unnecessary to remove either the magazine or the reel for the purpose of rewinding; in fact, with reasonable care and by the use of a few feet of white leader on the film, it is not even necessary to disconnect the film from either reel until the film is to be changed for a different subject. One and one-quarter minutes is sufficient time to rewind a film and re-thread for the next show, when using a Motiograph Patented Rewind.

ESSANAY NOTES.

Featured for release April 2, the Essanay's Western drama, "The Flower of the Ranch," contains numerous episodes taken from actual happenings. Another notable fact is that some of the actors in the picture are the originals of the real episodes. The Essanay's story concerns a little girl, whose mother ran away with an Eastern visitor at the ranch and whose father was shot in endeavoring to arrest two drunken cowboys, who were causing a disturbance in the village. The little girl is taken care of by her father's faithful cowboys, and ten years later, is lured from her home by the same Easterner who had run off with her mother. The Easterner, however, is apprehended before the girl is harmed, and arrested on a charge of wife abandonment. Two or three of the cowboys who appear in the picture were witnesses of the real happenings and declare that the Essanay story is very nearly correct.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

On Friday, April 15, "The Call of the Heart" will be presented. To mention this picture as a drama does not give full explanation or convey an adequate idea of the richness of emotion and the depth of sentiment expressed. It is a story replete with sweet human sympathy, arousing the too often dormant feelings of charity, unselfishness and love for others less fortunate than ourselves. It demonstrates the influence of the child upon older hearts and minds and the betterment of the world at large.

A jolly good hearty laugh is contagious. If you enjoy a good story with a laugh at every turn of the crank, paste "A Funny Story" inside your hat and don't forget it. The vitagraph comedians are paid to make laugh-producers; it was no trouble to get the whole studio on the job when they told "A Funny Story"; even the directors and the heads of the establishment joined in.

For some time past exhibitors of Vitagraph pictures have deluged us with requests for photographs of the favorite Vitagraph actors and actresses. To show our appreciation of this widespread public interest the company has prepared a beautifully designed and lithographed group of Vitagraph portraits in color, for lobby display. Exhibitors who wish this ornamental and attractive feature of advertising, can secure it at a nominal cost by writing us without delay.

"Love's Awakening." "Here we are again," as the clown says, on April 19. A real circus drama with a pathetic love story so deftly interwoven that we are intermittently in laughter and tears throughout its recital, and O! so happy with the gradual awakening and triumph of love at the end. It has a true ring in it.

"Her Sweet Revenge," a comedy sunbeam; a natural, bubbling bit of life, to be released on April 22. The influence of a happy-hearted, sweet-tempered young life over the warped dispositions of a soured household. A burst of sunshine into the shadows of a gloom-infested home. This is a picture of the bright side of life, to brighten up and rejuvenate the moody and morose and make everybody brighter and better for having seen it.

"MADAME SANS GENE."

This film, which has just been issued by the Great Northern Film Company, sets the standard of perfection for classical subjects by Independent manufacturers. An incident in the life of the great Napoleon is presented by competent actors and with a stage setting that is most elaborate and befitting the character of the picture. No Independent exhibitor should fail to present this notable film or to demand from his exchange one of the most unique and elaborate posters that we have ever seen. This poster will draw the crowd and they will be satisfied when they see the film.

THE IMP LEADING LADY.

The newspaper report of the death of Miss Lawrence, the leading character in most of the Imp films, so upset her many admirers in St. Louis that nothing short of seeing her in the flesh would satisfy them. Mr. Talbot, manager of the Gem Theater, in St. Louis, has arranged for a public reception for Miss Lawrence in three theaters and she left for St. Louis on Friday, accompanied by Mr. King Baggott, leading man, and Mr. H. L. Solter, director. Mr. Cochrane, the manager of the company, went along to see that no one attempted to kidnap his valuable trio.

The Imp actors will give a stage demonstration of moving pictures in the making and their St. Louis friends have arranged for a grand reception. Mr. Cochrane takes with him a film showing how the reading of Miss Lawrence's obituary notice affected the other members of the Imp Company. If anyone can see the hand of the press agent in this, that person must at least be credited with a clever and original idea. And Miss Lawrence is a clever girl and is worthy of the attention she has attracted.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

There are many incidents in a day's work at a moving picture studio. To the Thanhouser studio one day came a darkey to see "one uv de pro-doocers." Producer Carleton saw the "gen'man."

"Ah was kicked squar in de head by a mule Friday, on Hugenot street," stated the visitor, "and de doctors at de New Rochelle Hospital said dere was nary a scratch on me. Furdermore, you kin call up de hospital and ask if what I say ain't de Gospel truth. Now—now—fer five dollars I'd let enudder mule give me enudder kick in de same place—and say, boss, it would make a bully picture!"

The man was told there were no plays on hand calling for that kind of scene and he left quite downcast. Then Carleton called him back and asked him if he would mind posing at something milder. The darkey said, "not at all."

"Would you do something so simple and harmless as—bowing?" asked the producer.

"Sure. An' Ah kin bow to puhfection, suh," said the darkey. "Ah'm famous for mah po-liteness."

So Carleton cast him for the part of the bowing colored comedian in the theater scene of "The Actor's Children," and competent critics who saw the picture think he has really made good.

"She's Done It Again!" the third Thanhouser release, is said by those who should know to be just what a moving picture comedy ought to be. Roy Norton, the noted author, read the comedy in the script and writes: "It is ideal. It centers on a big idea and the writer keeps his incidents thoroughly subordinate to the main theme." Lloyd F. Lonergan, of the New York World, wrote the scenario and Anna Rosemond and Frank Crane play the leading roles.

CORRESPONDENCE.

March 23, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In an article appearing in the "Show World" of March 19, the following statement was made:

"Mr. Storey stated that only 10 to 15 per cent. of the total output of films inspected by the Board went through entirely as the manufacturers produced them. Another official of the Board said that almost 75 per cent. of the Pathe Freres productions had to be censored or changed."

We desire to state that this is an unqualified mis-statement. Neither Mr. Storey nor the other official referred to ever made this statement, nor is it true in any degree.

NATIONAL BOARD OF CENSORSHIP.
Walter Storey, General Secretary.

A TIP TO EXHIBITORS FROM A K. OF P.

To The Moving Picture World:

As your magazine goes everywhere that there is a moving picture theater (and that's everywhere), I thought I would make a suggestion that might help many of your readers.

There are some excellent reels going the rounds of "Damon and Pythias" and every town big enough to support a moving picture show is full of Knights of Pythias, and the managers of theaters could fill their houses with Pythians when they get those reels if they would look up the leading Pythians and many Pythian Lodges would like to have them for benfits and private entertainments if they were but informed of the existence of these films. There are 800,000 Pythians in the United States in 8,000 subordinate lodges. These Pythians and their families and friends would be interested in these pictures.

ARMY CHAPLAIN USES MOVING PICTURES.

Editor Moving Picture World:

I wish to state that I have been using a kinetoscope and moving picture films in my work with the soldiers at Fort McHenry, Baltimore, Md., for about a year, with pronounced satisfaction. At present I am using films of Biblical subjects in connection with my vespers service and have an attendance as large as can be seated in the chapel, with occasionally a number standing. Enclosed herewith the program of my service for last Sunday. Very respectfully,

J. E. YATES,
Chaplain, Coast Artillery Corps. Fort McHenry, Md.

FROM AN EXHIBITOR TO THE MAUFACTURERS.

Pittsfield, Mass., March 10, 1910.

Editors Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—Your valuable paper this week, March 12, is so full of "meat" that I am moved to say a few words, as there are so many articles in The World that echo my sentiments.

I have had a number of years' experience in the theatrical business, both as an actor and producer, having produced everything from "tabloid dramas" for vaudeville to operas and plays on a large scale.

In the article on the "Dramatic Moment," I think the author has hit the nail on the head when he says the important feature is the climax or dramatic moment. I am speaking from the standpoint of a manager who has operated several houses at one time, all showing moving pictures exclusively. I have watched and studied my audiences in all kinds of moods and under all kinds of conditions. Of the hundreds yes, thousands, of moving picture plays that I have exhibited, the number of subjects that have had the climax or dramatic moment is so small as to be almost forgotten. How many pictures I have seen that as they approached the ending I have felt "now is the time for a grand moment, the dramatic climax," but alas and alack, the same old story, the play ended with an anti-climax then a lot of silly posing or long dragged out unnecessary work. It is the same in comedies, some fine comedy working to a grand comedy finish, and then the same old drop, killing the effect of the good moments gone before. Come, Mr. Manufacturer, end your picture when the story is told and if you must pad it out to make a full reel, put the padding in the middle of the story and not at the end.

Another article that appeals to me is the one regarding the publishing of the names of the authors and players. It has been demonstrated very thoroughly to me by my audiences that each time the name of a featured artist or author is given the interest is much greater, besides giving the exhibitor a chance to advertise something besides "just moving pictures." I am using Independent pictures, as I wrote you some time ago, and I notice that the leaders of the foreign manufacturers are publishing the names of the players. Of course these foreign names are not well known to American audiences, but the idea is there and I know personally that I could create a large amount of interest if I had the names of players or authors to advertise. I can soon make the individual players popular, as could any exhibitor.

Trusting you may find room for these remarks in one of your future issues in the hope that it may bring to the manufacturer a realization that we exhibitors are alive and observing, I am, thanking you for your many courtesies,

Yours very truly,

A. H. SAWYER.

[It is certainly a healthy sign of the times when an exhibitor is so observant of the requirements of his audiences. The more of this element there is in the business, the better it is bound to be for it, because then the manufacturers will be stimulated to more closely study the requirements of the public.—Eds. M. P. W.]

The Excela Soundograph

The only complete and up-to-date effect-producing machine ever invented is now complete and ready for the exhibitors. Everybody pronounces it a wonder. Almost any sound or effect imaginable is easily and realistically produced by simply turning a crank, pulling a handle or pushing a button. The effects are all mounted in a handsome cabinet structure, 25 x 40 inches square and 42 inches high, with means exterior for the operation of each effect separately, or they can be operated in combinations. The Soundograph can be located either in the orchestra, pit or back of the screen as the exhibitor prefers. No expert operator is required, any one person is all that is needed to operate the Soundograph and produce perfect sound effects. A boy or some other employee of the theatre learns quickly to work the effects, thus relieving the exhibitor of the services of an expensive operator. It will put life and realism in your pictures and delight your audiences. It holds their interest and attention to the end of the reel and assures you of big box office receipts every day.

GOLD IS NOT ALL

A LESSON TO BLIGHT THE SEED OF DISCONTENT

No truer maxim was ever coined than that "Gold is not all." While gold has egregious power, yet it will not purchase health, happiness, immortality, nor eternal paradise. The psychological import of this Biograph subject shows the chimerical result of our struggle to possess wealth. Here we find a finely drawn parallel of the rich and the poor. The poor envying the rich, while the condition of the rich is anything but enviable. The wealthy start on the journey through life only to find the path strewn with the thorns of woe and disappointment, with an existence that is selfish and loveless; while the poor have at least that greatest of God's gifts, filial and parental love. Clouds begloom the rich household. Sunshine bathes the home of the lowly. The photography of the film is undoubtedly the most beautiful ever shown.

THE SMOKER

A newly married young man finds his wife objects to his smoking, and not being able to break himself of the habit, hires a room at a farmhouse in which to enjoy the weed. His wife's suspicions are aroused by his absence at regular periods, fancying an intrigue, but upon learning the real cause, decides if he must smoke, so insatiable seems the craving, it better be at home.

HIS LAST DOLLAR

This is a very laughable comedy of a young man's adventure when he takes a young girl into a swell restaurant with his capital consisting of one dollar, and not only that, to have two of her friends join them. Well, the dollar only serves as a tip for the waiter, and he is forced to leave his watch and diamond pin as security for the bill. This is bad enough, but the worst comes when upon leaving the cafe the girl goes off with another fellow.

STORIES OF THE FILMS

BIOGRAPH COMPANY.

GOLD IS NOT ALL.—A lesson to blight the seed of discontent. Paradoxical as this expression may seem, there never was a truer maxim framed. "Gold is not all." What a moral those four words teach. Can it purchase happiness? Rarely. Can it assure health? No. Can it procure immortality? Never. Can it promise us eternal paradise? Of course not. And yet, we madly struggle to gain it, vainly believing it omnipotent, and capable of inducing conditions Utopian. Alas, this is the most chimerical hallucination of humankind. No clearer illustration has ever been shown than in this Biograph production. First is shown the poor looking with wonder and envy on the rich, assuming their lives to be nothing but sunshine. Sunshine, maybe, but such sunshine does not reach the heart. From here begins the parallel most clearly and finely drawn. The young heiress is walking with her sweetheart in the grounds of her mansion, seemingly happy, while on the roadway, with but a wall dividing, stroll the poor young couple. What a contrast. Here are four young souls starting on their paths of life so divergent. What may we assume? The one couple, with wealth and position, hence ease and happiness seems the outlook; the other couple, poor and uncultured, their future would seem sorrow, labor and privation. But how fallible is the prophesy. Ten years later we meet them again. Mabel, the heiress, has been the wife of Tom Darrell all this while, as has been Ruth the wife of Steve. It is the occasion of a house party at the Darrell mansion and Ruth's heart grows sad and envious at the sight of the lavishness of the affair as she views it from a distance. At her humble home she is made to forget it in the true love of Steve. How different with Mabel. Tom has now cruelly deserted her, writing that she has wealth sufficient to make her and the child happy. This seems logical, but is it? Here we find a house of trouble. On the other hand, we find Ruth in her little cottage where love abides. However, she is irresistibly drawn to the gateway of the mansion just as Mabel drives through up to the house. Envy again grips her, but little does she know that this pleasant way leads to a room of tears, for Mabel's child is taken seriously ill, with no hope of recovery. What is the value of her gold now? "It cannot rescue from the grave, which claims alike the monarch and slave." Vivid, indeed, is the contrast now—Ruth and her honest devoted husband, with their children playing about them, all happy, healthy and contented; but we see Mabel crouching beside the deathbed of her little one, alone and forsaken. To her aching heart her gold is indeed poor balm.

THE SMOKER.—"It's a habit." When that expression is applied to any of the little weaknesses of the flesh, the implication spells, "It's a disease," and an incurable one at that. George is addicted to the smoking habit, in fact he might be termed a "Tobacco Fiend." To Alice, his wife, the fumes of tobacco smoke are extremely odious, and after a deal of persuasion he yields to her plea, swearing never to smoke the weed again. At first it seems possible, but later there comes such an insatiable craving he can stand it no longer, so he rents a quiet place where he goes and smokes in peace. All goes well, until his better half notices the regularity of his little walks, ostensibly for exercise, and she grows suspicious of she knows not what. However, she is determined to satisfy herself as to whether or not her hubby tells the truth, hence she has a small boy follow him. Well, there is apparently a storm ahead for George, after the boy reports the result of his investigations to Alice. He saw George go down the road, turn to the left, pass through a farmyard, speak to a woman—yes, a woman—and enter the house, where he is still. "Oh, the perfidious wretch!" cries Alice, and out she goes pilfted by the boy, only to surprise George in company with his pipe enjoying a clandestine smoke. The chagrin at the groundlessness of her jealousy, and the realization of the strength of the craving in her hubby, softens her heart, and she not only waives her objections to his tobacco habit, but becomes an accomplice in his weakness by procuring for him all the tobacco and cigars he will need for months. Now he never wanders from his own steam radiator—as they reside in a flat and have no fireside.

HIS LAST DOLLAR.—Did you ever take a young lady friend into a swell restaurant and find that she is possessed with a champagne thirst, while you are possessed with a beer capital—no? Well, you don't know the sensation. To illustrate—your foot is caught in the frog of the railroad track and you are gazing with horrible anticipation into the grinning countenance of the oncoming locomotive—you feel sure of a bump, but you are not sure you'll feel the bump. This was the sensation experienced by Hank when he took Miss Bird into the cafe, with one silver dollar in his pocket. There were some nice large glasses of beer to be obtained for five cents, but this she spurned, for the menu of that day was very alluring. It was aristocratic food, not plebeian drink, she desired, and so she starts to order. Surprised groans from Hank. But the worst is yet to come. Several friends of Miss Bird appear. "Why, boys! You're just in time to join us." Hank (sotto-voce), "And I only have a dollar." The meal is over; the boys have departed regaled and poor Hank is longer and leaner than ever, but the bill presented him, while long, is by no means lean. "And I only have a dollar." The dollar the waiter takes as a tip, and Hank's watch and pin are left behind to liquidate the bill. Not only that. On leaving the cafe, Miss Bird meets a gentleman friend and shakes Hank unceremoniously. As Hank views their forms fading in the distance, he murmurs, "I shall hie me to the lemon grove where I belong." He does.

EDISON MFG. CO.

MICHAEL STROGOFF: A Courier of the Czar.—At a diplomatic function given at the Czar's palace in Moscow about 1870 word is received by the Chief of the Secret Police that all telegraphic communication between the town of Tomsk and Irkutsk has been cut off and that Ivan Ogareff, a Russian traitor who has allied himself with the Tartars, is advancing on the last named city. Ogareff has sworn to take the life of the Grand Duke, the Czar's brother, who is Governor of the Provinces about Irkutsk. There is only one way to send word warning the Grand Duke of his danger, and that is by a courier. This courier must be a man of iron nerve and endless resources. The Chief of the Russian Secret Police selects for this arduous task Michael Strogoff, a soldier of the Imperial Guard who has won distinction for feats of valor. Strogoff is brought before the Czar and entrusted with the message. He starts on his perilous journey in disguise.

While traveling toward the Siberian frontier in a railway coach he resents an insult to a young and beautiful Russian girl, Nadia Feador, who is likewise traveling to Irkutsk. Michael is attracted by the gentleness of the girl, but does not yield to the impulse of offering to accompany her on her journey. Fate, however, brings these two people together later. While eating at a post restaurant on the Siberian frontier, Strogoff's mother sees him and attempts to embrace him. Knowing that he is watched by the Tartar spies and that his acknowledgment of his mother will disclose him to his enemies, he pretends that he does not know the woman. Ogareff and Sangarre, his gypsy accomplice, witness this incident and suspect Strogoff. Ogareff despatches soldiers in pursuit of Michael and orders his mother to be taken prisoner. Strogoff escapes, only to be captured at a telegraph station, where he later goes in an effort to secure a fresh horse. Ogareff has the Russian prisoners assembled before the Tartar chief in order to identify Michael. He questions Marfa Strogoff, Michael's mother who stoutly denies that Michael is her son. To test the truth of her statement Ogareff orders that Marfa be lashed with a knout. As the executioner is about to strike his mother Michael springs at him, wrests the weapon from his hand and strikes Ogareff across the face. He is immediately seized. Ogareff searches him, takes the Czar's message from his bosom and denounces him before the Tartars as a spy. The punishment meted out to Michael is that he shall be blinded. This is done by placing a heated sword blade before his eyes. After blinding him, as they believe, the Tartars set him free, considering him now harmless. Nadia, who has been an unwilling spectator of this awful scene, comes to Michael's assistance, takes him by the hand and leads him on his journey. On the road they meet a friend of Michael's, who takes them into his cart and on toward Irkutsk.

The final accomplishment of Michael's mission is splendidly portrayed in scenes that can not be surpassed for intensity of dramatic interest. Halted by the Tartar sentries before Irkutsk, his blindness is tested by forcing him to walk forward toward a sword pointed at his breast. Here follows the strong scene of the story. Ogareff laughs at Michael and, flourishing his sword, is about to run him through. He is astonished, however, when Michael draws his Siberian knife and quickly parries the blow. Thinking that the parry is a mere chance, Ogareff quickly aims his saber at Michael's head. Again the blow is deftly parried. Ogareff now realizes that Michael is not blind, and that to save his own life he will have to smother Michael by the very fury of his attack before the palace is alarmed. Swinging his saber he rushes again at Michael, and a thrilling fight results, in which Ogareff meets the fate he so justly deserves. The officers of the Grand Duke and the Grand Duke himself enter the room at this point and Michael is made a prisoner, but when his explanation is heard and understood he is immediately released, and the Grand Duke's gratitude is shown in the final tableau of the picture.

THE HEART OF A ROSE.—An old professor of chemistry, a widower, who has cared for his young ward, Alice, since childhood and has watched her blossom into beautiful womanhood until his old heart beats quicker at her glance finally, as time passes on, finds himself in love with his young ward. He has won her respect and affection, and out of duty to him she accepts his offer of marriage, fully believing at the time that he will make her happy and with no thought that anything will ever arise to make her regret her course. It is at this period that our story actually opens. In the professor's rose garden, among his books and flowers, his promised bride interrupts him in his studies and he dissects for her a rose. A letter is received from his son, congratulating him upon his coming marriage and informing him that he will return home before the wedding takes place. The professor expresses great joy and pride in his son's return, while Alice exhibits only mild pleasure. She hardly remembers him, as it has been years since she last saw him. During the next scene in the professor's laboratory a chemical explosion occurs in which the professor loses his sight. The son hastens home at the news of his father's affliction. It is then that Alice and the son meet again. This meeting makes a great change in each of their lives, and when next we see them, a few weeks later, they have fallen deeply in love with each other; but they try to hide their feelings till in the rose garden, over the old sun-dial, the truth is revealed in a look—a touch of the hand. When the old professor finds them together the first lie of guilt is told. Then follows a series of terrifically strong dramatic scenes, in which the son and father's ward, their hearts aflame with love, try to crush out the fire that they may not mar the life of one whom they both love and respect.

One day the professor suddenly regains his sight. With great joy he hastens to acquaint his ward and son of the glad news, when all at once he realizes that a new love has sprung up in the heart of his rose. His is too noble a nature to sacrifice youth for old age, and after a beautiful, pathetic scene in which his heart is torn with conflicting emotions he leads his ward into the arms of his son. Their hearts united, the old professor turns sadly back to his books and crucibles.

IT PAYS TO ADVERTISE.—The course of true love never does run smooth, and when the young man has steered that course up to the proposal moment he has generally nerved himself, like one going into battle, determined to do or die. How disheartening it must be then to the hero to have the words so carefully rehearsed interrupted and laughed at by the one girl in the whole world, and, worse of all, to have her affect utter ignorance of what he really means. That is the way this picture starts, but fortunately for its happy ending our hero is not a man to be easily defeated. When the girl and her mother teasingly laugh him out of his proposal he goes away, disconsolate but far from discouraged, and thinks it over—and the next morning he has an idea. He serves notice on the girl that she shall receive a proposal from him every day in the week, which, of course, only excites her to further merriment at her lover's expense, although she is somewhat curious to learn what form the proposals shall take, and more than inclined to admire her lover's persistence. Now the young man is in the "publicity" business and, being used to putting advertising matter on every available part of the landscape, he quite naturally adopts such methods to carry out his plans in this instance.

Beginning with the box of candy, in which she finds the words upon a candy heart, his advertised proposal haunts her wherever she goes—in street cars, on fences and banners, on moving vans, trolley cars and telegraph poles, until in sheer desperation she stays at home on Saturday night to receive the young man and give him his answer. How she does this it would not be fair to tell. Suffice it to say that the denouement provides not only a deft comedy touch and a pretty finish to a love story, but a unique photographic effect which approaches real art pretty closely.

THE FLOWER OF THE RANCH.—Frank Wendell, a ranchman, also the sheriff of his county, is about to leave home on the rounds of duty one morning when a buckboard drives up to the house, and a gentleman, whose careful grooming and style of dress signifies a man from back East, alights and presents Wendell with a note from a former friend of the ranchman, introducing Mr. Frederick Church, who desires to spend a few weeks on Wendell's ranch for the purpose of bettering his health. Unsuspecting the true character of the stalwart Easterner, Wendell welcomes him and, with the big hospitality of the Western householder, tells him to make himself at home.

A month goes by and with its passing a tragedy. Wendell returns home one evening to find the Easterner and his wife and child gone. A note left on the center table explains it all. Mary has tired of ranch life and accepted Church's invitation to enjoy with him life in some Eastern metropolis. The little girl they have taken with them.

The broken-hearted husband winces as he reads the note and looks about the lonesome room. He does not now care for the faithless woman but he must regain the little girl, his little girl, whom he could never trust in the hands of so vile and flagrant a deceiver as Frederick Church.

Quickly saddling his swiftest horse, Wendell mounts and starts in pursuit of the runaways. After an hour or so he overtakes them and forces Mrs. Wendell to return Dorothy, their child. When the little one is at her father's side he commands Church to drive on.

Two days later, in endeavoring to arrest two drunken cowboys, who are causing a disturbance in the village, Wendell is shot. Carried tenderly to the porch of his cottage the sheriff dies, after exacting the promise of his cowboy friends to care for Dorothy, his little girl.

True to their promise "the boys" make a home for the little girl, whom they call, lovingly, "the flower of the ranch."

Ten years go by and we find Dorothy, a pretty maiden of seventeen, the flower just bursting into the full bloom of womanly perfection. The tragedy of her earlier life has almost been forgotten and she has come to love her cowboy friends, each as an individual father or a brother, and the trust is well met. If she is partial to any, it may be with Dick Clayton, a stalwart and manly young fellow, who all but worships her.

One day a touring automobile, a big car of a variety seldom seen in the mountains, drives up the main street and stops at the post office and general store. Its arrival causes a sensation and the cowboys gather about discussing it wonderingly. The over inquisitive Dorothy is with them and her curiosity and desire to take a short spin is granted by the owner, a tall, handsome middle aged man. The Easterner finds the village and its locality especially attractive and spends much of a portion of two weeks in the company of Dorothy, to whom he has become suddenly affectionate. The affair ends in Dorothy's promising to be his bride and a day or two later she bids her cowboy friends goodbye and the big touring car with the prospective bride and groom sweeps out of town.

Hardly have they been gone ten minutes before Willis White, the young sheriff, rides up and shows them a paper containing a picture of Dorothy's fiance, "Frederick Church wasted for wife abandonment!"

The news electrifies the little crowd of cowboys, who now realize by what peril little Dorothy is menaced, and mounting their ponies they start in pursuit of the flying touring car.

A thrilling chase, one of the best ever shown, ends when the auto breaks down and the pursuers haul the frightened Easterner from his car and show him the paper. A lynching is averted when White rides on the scene and appeals to them to let the law take its course.

The story ends with little Dorothy in her Western lover's arms when she promises to be the latter's wife, with the consent, of course, of the "boys," who are at first reluctant to give her up.

IMAGINATION.—Tom Perkins, so our story goes, is a physical culturist and the results of his careful training in abstinence from coffee, liquor and tobacco, with the daily cold bath and vigorous rub, has made him egotistical about it.

His robust health and how he obtained it is usually the substance of his conversations with his friends until they tire of being constantly shamed for the flabbiness of their muscles and shortness of breath and the other ills that flesh is heir to.

Tom, in taking his morning constitutional, meets an old friend who is slightly under the weather and for whom he prescribes a daily four mile walk, a cold bath and a rubdown as a positive cure-all. They are standing in front of a cafe and Tom invites his friend in to have a little drink of something soft.

They enter the cafe and meet other friends. "Why, brace up there," says Tom to one of the boys, slapping the latter vigorously on the back, "you're getting round shouldered. Look at me. Physical culture did it!"

Three fellows at the other end of the bar nudge each other and quietly steal out of the cafe, resolved to get even with Tom in some way or another.

"It's an easy thing," says one. "Let one of us tell him he's looking bad; another fellow can meet him down the street and tell him he's looking worse, while the third fellow can tell him he ought to be in bed. If that don't fix him nothing will!"

They agree to the scheme and one fellow is left at the saloon entrance while the other two select positions further down the street. Also, they enlist the aid of a friendly "cop" and two ladies who are acquainted with the victim, with the result that he is really feeling ill when the two ladies, last named, stop him and comment upon his wan face and general physical decrepidness.

Tom turns away unsteadily and looks at his tongue in a small hand-glass, wiping the perspiration from his brow. A climax is reached when he sees his wife and daughter just leaving a florist's with a great armful of flowers. Poor Tom is convinced that the flowers are for his funeral.

He is sent home in a cab and put to bed. A doctor is summoned and accompanies the three jokers into the house. The doctor finds that Tom is very ill indeed, ahem, and doses him with some very bitter but harmless medicine. But the boys' laughter and finally the doctor's confession cures the patient instanter.

With a howl of rage at being fooled he springs from the bed and in his pajamas chases the jokers through the snow. The picture ends with the sick one (?) whipping them all and stalking proudly away, the complete victor.

HENRY'S NEW HAT. Henry (our old friend again) is the chief clerk in a big real estate and insurance office. He is a dapper little fellow with great pride in his personal appearance, and Henry's clothes, his hat, his gloves and cane are both the pride and fun of the rest of the office boys.

But, to go on with the story, Henry resolves to buy another hat, "something really swell, you know." So he hies him to the hatter and looks over the hatter's supply. Various styles and shapes and sizes, soft crushers and dinky dicers, are laid out for his inspection until "the" hat, a shiny silk opera affair, the very latest Parisian creation, is placed in his hands. Henry surveys himself in the glass approvingly. "Ah, my dear hatter," he comments, "this is some hat. I'll take. Send it to my office."

The hatter's boy, an ambitious youth, arrives at the office ahead of him and deposits the hat on Henry's desk. After the boy leaves Henry's pals gather around, remove the box lid and peer curiously in at the hat. All agree that the hat is a "pippin" and, always mindful of some deviltry or other, they decide to have some sport with their immaculate chief. One of them substitutes an old battered "dicer" for the new hat and when Henry arrives all immediately ask him to let them see his new hat.

"Ah, boys," he says, "allow me to show you, really, the swellest thing in town!"

He opens the hat box smiling happily and lifts the battered skypiece from its receptacle. With mingled surprise and rage he looks at the hat gingerly while the boys look wonderingly on. Still raging, Henry turns to the 'phone and, as mad as the proverbial hatter, denounces the merchant as a cheat and a liar. While he is hurling his invectives into the surprised ears of the hatter the boys remove the old hat and replace the new one and when Henry turns from the 'phone they thrust the box into his hands and advise that he annihilate the hatter who could play such a witless and malicious joke.

Henry rushes back to the hatter and hurls the box in his face. The merchant opens the hat box and there is another surprise, of course! For, behold the bright shiny tile which he originally purchased!

The hatter puts him out and the conclusion, a crushing one, comes when the hat is trampled under the feet of a crowd pursuing a street thief!

PATHE FRERES.

THE LITTLE VIXEN.—Angeline was the daughter of wealthy parents, and a coquette. Max is deeply in love with her, but the young lady is so fickle, that although Max has proposed many times, she has never given him a decided answer. Time and time again, the poor fellow has offered his heart and hand, but to no avail. Angeline thinks that Max is too much of a dilettante, and finally in a spirit of mischief, she replies to one of his numerous proposals by telling him that she will never marry until he has learned to juggle three balls. Even the remonstrances of her father fail to move her from her declaration. Poor Max! he knows very well that this is practically out of the question. Nevertheless, he decides to make an attempt, and after visiting a store wherein he buys the requisite number of balls, he hies him home and spends hours and hours in the vain attempt to master the mysteries of the juggler. After succeeding in smashing up all the furniture in the house, overturning chairs, and breaking up housekeeping generally, a happy thought strikes him, and he writes to Angeline that he has accomplished her test, and that if she and her father would call, will gladly demonstrate his skill in the stunt. Angeline and papa call. Max repairs behind a screen and with only his head and arms showing, juggles most dexterously. His visitors are amazed, but unfortunately in the wild endeavor to surpass himself in his juggling act, Max overturns the screen, and lo and behold! it's another man's arms doing the juggling act, while Max leaning over him shows only his head above the screen. We hope that Angeline through the trick sufficiently clever to take him anyhow.

THE POLAR BEAR HUNT.—This picture opens with the hunting party about to disembark from the steamer anchored in a sheltered spot in the Arctic. Ice floes are to be seen on every hand, and in the distance a berg may be noted on which two polar bears are gamboling. The hunting party having descended into a rowboat, pull for the nearest ice floe. Here they haul up their boat, and drag it across the ice to the next open lead. Then into the water and on again. After this difficult trip is nearly accomplished, one of the hunters take a long shot at the polar bears, who in the meantime having seen the hunters approach, have made a wild break for liberty, running across the ice, and swimming the open water. As the hunter fires one bear drops. The party now advance to within a few paces of the big white beast, but as they approach they grow cautious for fear Sir Bruin is not dead. Sure enough, when they are quite close, the bear stands up on his hind legs and shows fight, but the foremost huntsman dropping on one knee, fires another bullet and Mr. Bear spins around, turns a somersault and drops in a lump on his head. Loading the carcass into the boat, returning to the ship and hauling the game aboard, are successively shown, and the picture ends with a view on board showing two polar bear cubs which have been captured. From the savage way these cubs attack their chains, one would scarcely be led to believe they would make good house pets. The film is not only interesting, in its vivid depiction of a hunting scene, but also in the fact that it is taken in the very region in which Commander Peary so recently made his world-startling discovery.

OUT OF SIGHT, OUT OF MIND.—The son of the Count is deeply in love with a pretty little peasant girl. Together they roam the fields, along the roads and over the hills, much to the displeasure of the Count. One morning, after a long series of lessons with his tutor, the lad goes out for a walk with his mother, and coming upon a crowd of boys and girls dancing in the fields, he dances the minuet with his little sweetheart, while his mother and tutor look on with tolerant eyes. When they proceed, the young girl follows the party, and after a while the youth unable to stand the separation longer, slips away from the party and runs back to his inamorata. Together they go to the well to fill the jug which the girl carries. They are watched by a farmer lad, who is also deeply in love with the girl, but whose attentions are scorned by this young lady, because of his humble birth. When the boy's absence from the party is discovered, the tutor rushes back to find him, and seeing him in company with the little peasant, reports the occurrence to his mother, who immediately upon reaching home decides to send her son to the city to find employment in the service of the King. The separation between the boy and girl is very tearful, never will he be able to forget her, and she weeping tells him that he will always hold the affection of her heart. A few minutes after he has ridden away, however, she comes upon her other lover, the farmer lad, and thinking that a bird in the hand is worth two in a bush, after a moment of protest, walks off happily arm in arm with the sweetheart who remains behind. The coloring of this picture is of rare beauty, and the scenes, many of which are taken outdoors, are charming to the highest degree.

DRIVEN TO STEAL.—The story is of a poor family, where the husband is out of work and unable to supply the wants of his sick wife and children. The picture shows the room where the sick woman and her little baby are lying on a rude bed, and three other children are asking for something to eat. Unable to bear the sight of his wife suffering from want of nourishment, and his children's pleading, he at last becomes desperate and decides to steal. As he is walking along the street, he passes two or three men, but has not the courage to attack them. At last, becoming desperate, he decides to attack a rich man coming down the street. He jumps on him as he is turning the corner and steals his wallet, but after taking out one gold piece he returns the pocketbook to him. The stranger is astonished, and decides to follow the thief. He sees him going into a bakery, and afterwards appear with several loaves of bread which he has bought with the money he has taken. The victim following, sees him enter a house and he too enters. The poor man, when he enters his home with the bread, is joyfully received by the little ones, who bite from the whole loaves as if famished. As they are eating, the man from whom he has stolen the money enters, and understanding what has driven the man to steal, he gives him a place in his sawmill. The next picture shows the family all well and happy.

A WOMAN'S CAPRICE.—Pierrot is a blithesome lad who mends all the shoes in his little village. One day while at work in the bright Spring sunshine, a lady of high degree and her companion pass by. Unfortunately the lady has a nail in her slipper, and seeing the cobbler decides to let him fix it. Now it so happens that this lady is somewhat of a coquette, and seeing in Pierrot a chance for some amusement, flirts with the poor fellow until his head is completely turned, and his little sweetheart in his own station of life no longer appeals to him. Upon her departure, the lady drops a rose which Pierrot treasures. The next day one of milady's servants meets Pierrot at the tavern and following instructions from his mistress, drugs the cobbler's wine. When the poor chap is stupefied he is carried away to the big castle, and there before he awakes has all his clothes changed. When he opens his eyes he finds himself in a magnificent chamber, resplendent and luxurious. In a momnt or two the author of this mischief comes in, and for a little while Pierrot is in the seventh heaven of delight. After she has amused herself sufficiently, the poor fellow is persuaded to drink more drugged wine and is carried back towards home and thrown in a ditch. When he returns to consciousness, he is amazed to find himself in this position, and goes slowly homeward. The following day the capricious lady passes again, and when he seeks to claim a friendship she denies having ever seen him before. THE RHINEFALLS AT SCHAFFHAUSEN.—This picture is a marvelous view of the beautiful cataract at Schaffhausen on the Rhine. The waters tumble over the rocks which seem to comb them into long white tresses of exquisite beauty. So realistic is the picture, that one can almost hear the roaring of the water as it rushes in its mad course over the rocks. Several views are given and the coloring has been done with an eye for the beautiful, making a film of such surpassing interest that every theater should make a point of getting it.

LORENZO THE WOLF.—Luis is in love with Genevieve, but the match is not satisfactory to Genevieve's father, who wants a man of more strength and action than Luis, who is an artist. The fathers of the two young people, however, are good friends and often go off on hunting trips together through the estate. On one of these trips, Genevieve's father, in company with the father of Luis, comes across Lorenzo—"The Wolf," as he is popularly called—who is a poacher, and as he is in the act of setting snares, they capture him and turn him over to the police. Lorenzo begs for mercy, but is refused and so vows vengeance on the two men. Upon his release from prison, Lorenzo returns to his old haunts and one day, seeing Genevieve about to leave her house, he gags her and carries her off to his retreat in the mountains, where he lives in a cave. From here he sends a note to Genevieve's father telling him that he will never see her again. In the meantime, the father has missed his daughter and starts off in hot pursuit after Luis who he thinks is responsible for her disappearance. While he is accusing Luis the boy Lorenzo sent delivers the note, and Luis volunteers to lead them in the rescue party. By the aid of a good hunting dog he picks up Lorenzo's scent, and finally traces him to his lair, but before he can be captured, he empties his shotgun into Luis' shoulder. The wound proves slight, however, and Lorenzo is killed, and the two young people are at last united with the parents' consent.

THE WIFE OF MARCIUS.—In this production we at first see the old Roman column of a home of nobility, in the Atrium of the house of Marcius, a Roman warrior. It is his wife's birthday and he introduces his friend, Appius Ennius, who becomes enamoured of the wife. We then see Marcius, his wife, Marcia, and the former's quondam friend.

Upon the departure of the husband and wife from the banquet room, Appius forces Ostia, a slave, to assist him in winning the love of Marcia.

Favored by the emperor and at his own wish, he and Marcius are sent to the wars. We see them depart. The conniving Appius is recalled to court, and resumes his attentions to his friend's wife. But she, true to her lord and master, rejects him and repudiates his avowal of love. Then by stealth he secures a bracelet, the birthday gift of Marcius to his wife. This he does through the assistance of the slave, Ostia, and by this means endeavors to arouse doubt and jealousy in the heart of Marcius. In this he fails and in his failure receives his just deserts.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE INDISCRETIONS OF BETTY.—The familiar story of a woman living beyond her means is beautifully and impressively told in this picture. Her husband's income is not sufficient to keep up the style and pretentions of the society in which they move. A glimpse of the social set with which they affiliate is shown in the first scene, where the wife is introduced to an Austrian Count of sinister purpose, who makes advances to the young woman which are flattering to her, to say the least.

To keep in the social swim, she contracts all kinds of debts, and creditors press the husband for payment. He admonishes her, but, as usual, condones the offense. The afternoon of the same day a lady friend calls to see the young wife and gives her an invitation to a society event. She is distressed and declines, giving the customary reason, "Nothing to wear."

Her friend tells her that she will introduce her to a dressmaker with whom she can have a charge account. She acts upon the suggestion, falls to the temptation and orders a new gown for the coming events, where she is the cynosure of all eyes, particularly the Count's.

Again the inevitable creditor begins to urge her for payment. She is disturbed. A caller is announced—"the Count." He is ushered in, and, noticing her agitation, asks the cause. She tells him and he offers his check for the amount demanded by the creditor. She accepts it, to the great satisfaction of his Lordship, who feels that he has placed her in his power. He presumes upon this, calls upon her while she is alone, and forces his attentions. She repulses him and screams for help. Her husband, just arrived at home, hears her and rushes to her aid, felling the rascal and driving him from the house. The wife repentantly confesses her indiscretions, her husband forgives her and repays the Count in full.

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA—Special Two-Reel Licensed Subject Released April 18

Roosevelt Returning from Hunting Trip.

Roosevelt Breaking Camp at Bondoni.

Native War Dance in Honor of Roosevelt.

The Licensed Manufacturers co-operating issue, Monday, April 18th

ROOSEVELT IN AFRICA.

This great feature picture was secured at an enormous expense by the co-operation of all the manufacturers licensed by the Motion Picture Patents Company, the negatives having been made by Cherry Kearton, of London, who followed Col. Roosevelt to Africa and secured his co-operation after weeks of strenuous effort.

On April 21, 1909, the Roosevelt party landed at Mombasa, where arrangements had been made to outfit his hunting party. From Mombasa the expedition proceeded to the interior of the country for the purpose of making a complete collection of the beasts and birds of Africa for our great Smithsonian Institute in Washington, D. C. Now that it is complete and Col. Roosevelt is on his way home we know the expedition to have been the most successful the world has ever known.

Scene 1.
I Hear Roosevelt Is Coming.

This is a rare specimen of the Red Colobus and was in captivity when photographed. It is the only tame animal shown in the entire picture. Being presented with an American Sunday newspaper, he seems much interested, but does not indicate whether he feels fear or joy at the advent of the mighty American hunter.

Scene 2.
Government Buildings in Mombasa.

The first picture represents Mombasa with the new court house and the old Portugese prison, with a gang of chained prisoners filing past.

Mombasa has a beautiful and picturesque harbor. Centuries before the Christian era boats from Arabia rounded the lion's head, Guardafui, and worked their way slowly along the unhospitable African coast. Such boats as were used by the original voyagers exist to-day practically unchanged, and courageous indeed were the men who first navigated them across the boundless oceans. They were men of strong hearts and elastic conscience who braved inconceivable danger and hardship; they created trading stations for slaves, ivory and gold; these trading stations were converted into little cities, part negro, part Arab.

Mombasa was one of them. It lies just South of the Equator and is held by England.

Scene 3.
Col. Roosevelt Planting a Tree in Front of the Bomba Trading Company's Office.

This is the first appearance in our picture of "Teddy" as he appeared in front of the office of the Bomba Trading Company, where he planted a tree and was presented with a handsome and serviceable hunting knife.

Scene 4.
Native Amusements in Mombasa.

This is the Luna Park of Mombasa, located in the native quarters. We find the natives enjoying themselves the same as our people at our own Coney Island. You will notice the miniature Ferris wheel. Evidently the proprietor of this concession is enjoying a lucrative business the day this picture was made.

Scene 5.
Railway Trip From Kiu to Naquro, Made by Col. Roosevelt.

This trip was made across vast plains where thousands of African wild animals cross and recross the track at will and frequently mishaps occur on account of the engine running into these animals. There are mishaps frequently such as could only happen to this railroad. At the time Mr. Roosevelt went over this road there was an interruption in the telegraph service, due to giraffes having knocked down some of the wires and poles in tossing the track. Several times at night giraffes have been run into and killed.

On one occasion a rhinoceros was killed, the engine being damaged in the encounter. As the ride goes on we rise to some 7,000 feet above the sea level.

Scene 6.
Zulu Women at Spring.

This picture shows native Zulu women obtaining water at a spring. In this country the strong healthy, rugged women are able to bear burdens like a man and endure the hardest kind of labor. They spend the major portion of their life out of doors and are physically almost as powerful as the men.

Scene 7.
Dance of the Rain Maker.

The dance of the Rain Maker, with drummers in attendance, is quite a ceremonious affair. The Rain Maker is considered a very important official by the natives and is looked up to with great respect.

Scene 8.
Natives Drawing Water From a Well.

This sort of well antedates the Christian era and is found all over British East Africa. It is indeed primitive and one of the picturesque sights seen by visitors to this land of wonders.

Scene 9.
In the Kraal.

This a native kraal, or, as we would term it, corral, an enclosure for domestic animals, located near Kilima Kin. This is near the spot where the lions and rhinoceroses come down to drink.

Scene 10.
"Mister, Take My Picture."

Vanity knows no nationality. Here we find a number of native boys rushing up in front of the camera and asking the operator to take their picture.

Scene 11.
African Birds. Specimens Secured by Col. Roosevelt for the Smithsonian Institute. Kingfisher Feeding Young.

This picture shows the smallest kingfisher in the world, photographed on the edge of Lake Naivasha, carrying a small frog to its young.

It is a curious fact that this lake has no fish in it, probably on account of the soda deposit, yet cormorants and small sea gulls live on it, together with pelicans, herons, etc., all seeming to live on frogs.

Scene 12.
Jackson's Dancing Bird.

This photograph was made 8,500 feet above sea level. Jackson's dancing bird is most interesting. The male dances while the hen is setting.

This photograph took seven days to get from a blind or screen or hideup.

Scene 13.
Vultures and Storks Feeding.

This photograph took many days of weary patience. Waiting hidden under a screen with the tropical sun beating down upon the camera operator and whilst it was being taken a big rhinoceros started coming right for the camera, when the operator's guard, Mr. James Clark, of New York, shot him. Clark used to watch over the operator when in hiding, and a faithful guard he proved to be.

Marabon storks and vultures will pick a dead animal clean in a few hours and are very keen sighted. You will have a perfectly clear sky and when an animal is shot they seem to drop from the sky, but as to letting one get a cinematograph photo they are at once extremely wary, sitting for hours watching anything abnormal.

Scene 14.
Woodpecker Feeding Its Young.

Woodpeckers in East Africa are a decided nuisance. Through their actions it is almost impossible to maintain a wooden bridge in this country. Their vocation, drilling holes, becomes a great evil.

This picture shows a woodpecker feeding its young in the nest which has been drilled out of one of the uprights of an old bridge. So many holes having been drilled in the various posts and uprights, the bridge is at the present time toppling for a fall, and it is only a question of a very short time when the bridge will collapse through the weakening of its supports.

Scene 15.
Camp Roosevelt. Making and Breaking Camp at Bondoni.

We first find Roosevelt's party making camp at Bondoni. The next morning we find them preparing breakfast. After breakfast camp is quickly broken, the luggage is packed into bundles for the native porters.

The photograph of breaking camp was taken just after daylight and the men were marching by seven o'clock. In this section of British East Africa the sun rises all the year around at six o'clock and sets at six o'clock, with the exception of a ten minutes' difference.

Each native porter knows his work and the start is begun so that the day's march may not look too long. Besides heat has to be taken into consideration. Each man is given a load weighing about sixty pounds, which is the Government regulation, and is paid ten rupees per month, equal to about 33 cents per day, or $3.33 per month, with food. The loads are carried, as you will see, on the top of the head, and a march often consists of twenty-five miles a day. They are a jolly lot of fellows and if treated properly make the march enjoyable. They sing most of the way and many of them have a keen sense of humor and much appreciate any joke.

Scene 16.
Zulu War Dance and Ceremonies in Honor of Col. Roosevelt's Visit to Africa.

Again we find "Teddy" at a native ceremonial war dance given in his honor. He is accompanied by Governor Jackson, of British East Africa. The blacks are shown in full war regalia, with shield and spear, weird headgear and hideous facial adornment. This was a great sight and interested Col. Roosevelt very much indeed. The Zulu warriors danced for some hours, singing and giving forth queer guttural sounds, and toward the end became most excited.

You will notice when they charge a chief rushes up, putting his spear across their front to prevent their charging into the spectators. Some become hysterical and throw themselves across the ring formed and are quickly thrown to the ground, their weapons taken away by their comrades, who seem to kneel on them, circle around and disappear.

We are not aware of the method of bringing them around, but the dance went on just the same.

Scene 17.
Col. Roosevelt and His Party Reviewing Maneuvers.

This is a most interesting ceremony and shows the Zulus marching and counter marching in command of their native Zulu chiefs. You will note their war shields covered with skins of wild animals and their native spears.

We also call your attention to the wonderful physique and natural physical development of these remarkable warriors.

Scene 18.
Zulu Belles.

We herewith present a picture of a number of native Zulu belles. This party is supposed to represent British East Africa's native 400. To the minds of the male portion of the dark continent they are considered the personification of female beauty.

Scene 19.
Col. Roosevelt Examining Gun Before Being Presented to Chief Okawahki.

We here have a close view of the great American hunter examining a gun that is to be presented to Okawahki, one of the principal Zulu chiefs.

Scene 20.
Col. Roosevelt Taking the Trail.

Our next picture presents Col. Roosevelt mounted on horseback starting out on his day's hunting expedition. His porters bring up the rear in a long file carrying the camp paraphernalia on their heads. Most of these native porters are pagans. They very much enjoy this sort of life which is indeed picturesque. They are strong, patient and good humored savages, with something childlike about them that really makes one fond of them. Like some children and most savages they have their limitations and firmness is found more necessary than kindness when dealing with them.

Scene 21.
The Home of the Lizard.

These lizards were photographed on the banks of an old road side. They are very remarkable animals, changing in color just like the chameleon.

Scene 22.
Young Serval Cat.

This picture was made on the Aberdare Mountains. It was made after long waiting and under great difficulties. The operator lay in hiding eight hours waiting for this handsome animal to appear in the opening before a good picture could be taken.

Scene 23.
Giraffes on Their Native Heath.

One of this herd fell a victim to Kermit Roosevelt's gun.

Giraffes are very difficult animals to stalk, one reason is that they can look over a tree or hill on rough ground and you cannot spot your quarry. This photograph was taken about 150 yards away. The picture gives you a good idea of the ungainly shamble which quickly puts a good distance between you and the animals. The picture was taken near Sultan Hamud.

Scene 24.
The Deadly African Spider.

This large African ground spider is nearly two inches long. It waits in a little hole until its prey walks unsuspectingly along then it dashes out and secures a meal.

Scene 25.
Giant Land Turtle.

This is the largest land turtle known. It frequently lives to an age approximating 900 to 1000 years. There are two specimens in the zoo in Bronx park, New York, each over 800 years old.

Scene 26.
Flash Light of a Man Eating Lion in the Jungle.

This picture shows a flash light photo of a lion coming to drink about midnight. The photographer who made this picture spent many days trying to photograph lions by day and only got a chance at three 150 yards away, but the picture shows this king of the jungle so small the photograph was discarded but however he got his revenge. He left the camera in a leather case near the lion's drinking pool. Above it in a tree he arranged a flash light apparatus. From this a thread was passed across the path the lion was known to tread. In the middle of the night down came the lion to drink, he broke the thread, ignited the magnesium and took an instantaneous photograph of himself before the brilliant flash sent him crashing away in alarm through the forest.

Scene 27.
The Roosevelt Party Crossing Stream.

The next picture shows a portion of the Roosevelt party crossing a stream or ford. In this scene we have a very fine close view photograph of the party. You will note the manner in which the natives make a crossing. The white members of the party are carried on the shoulders of the sturdy porters. On either side of the men carrying the heavy load we find a porter, each with a stout rod or pole carefully feeling his way through the water, all the time sharply watching out for holes where he might drop in over his head.

Scene 28.
Chameleon at Play—Specimen Secured by Colonel Roosevelt's Party for the Smithsonian Institution.

This is a very fine picture of the horned chameleon. These curious and rare animals are found in great forests near Mt. Kenia and are extremely difficult to find, as they change their color to the surrounding foliage and they can change rapidly. After watching them for some time they suddenly loom out like a picture puzzle.

Scene 29.
Rhinoceros Mother and Baby.

Rhinoceroses are admitted by most people to be the most dangerous animals in British East Africa. You never know when they will pop out from behind some bush (perhaps a pair of them) and charge about twenty miles an hour puffing like a steam engine. The photographer who made this picture had many narrow escapes from these animals; while the photograph was being taken with his bodyguard Clark by his side, rifle all ready, they were anxious moments. A whisper from Clark (now they are going to charge, each look out for himself), but thanks to the favorable wind they never got our bearings and after debating suddenly gave out that terrible, terrifying puffing and suddenly bolted as you see in the picture.

Scene 30.
Rhinoceros Killed by Col. Roosevelt.

This large rhinoceros was killed by Roosevelt at Kilimakin. The skin was removed and taken to camp, where it was prepared for shipment to the Smithsonian Institute.

Scene 31.
Harte Beasts Roaming Over Veldt.

These animals roam in great herds over the wild East African veldt and are hard to stalk so that one may have a good shot at them.

Our photographer was unable to get a close view and was compelled to make his photographs at some little distance from the herd.

Scene 32.
Visiting Delegation of Gnus and Zebras.

This picture shows a large herd of gnu and zebra. These animals present a wonderful sight, as the picture shows, and any visitor to this land of animals would have a treat of a lifetime. Gnu and zebra seem to have a very friendly feeling for each other and travel in herds together.

Scene 33.
Hippopotami at Play in the Tana River.

As many as forty hippopotami within the space of one mile can be seen on some occasions on the Tana River and to watch them bathing in the sun with the tick birds running over them is a sight long to be remembered. These animals are very sensitive to smell and can detect you long before you come near the river bank if the wind is not right; on the other hand, if in your favor, you can stand openly on the bank and watch them with their young on their backs. Sometimes a slight puff will carry scent and down they will all plunge at once, afterwards only peeping up and blowing for a few seconds.

Scene 34.
Crocodile Taking His Morning Plunge.

This picture shows a large crocodile taken on a rock in the Tana River. These crocodiles grow to great size and are known to have pulled a rhino into the water weighing two tons.

Scene 35.
Picture of Young Deer.

This animal looks very fine and is very difficult to photograph. Our photographer in order to make this picture stalked five or six miles. You will agree with me, however, he eventually secured a very interesting photograph.

Scene 36.
Col. Roosevelt Returning from a Hunting Expedition.

This picture shows Col. Roosevelt crossing a drift or ford. The photograph was taken under Mount Kenia and represents one of the many little streams to be crossed under the gigantic mountain of some 18,000 feet with its snow-clad top and on the equator.

Here we find Roosevelt stopping to give his weary horse a drink. Trailing behind in single file is an innumerable band of porters. On the march the American flag is always carried by one man who sees to its safety. When the camp is pitched it is put up in front of Roosevelt's tent.

THANHOUSER.

DADDY'S DOUBLE.—Hal Dunton is very much in love with Sue Post—in fact, too much so to suit Sue's father. To drive the matrimony idea out of Sue's head, papa places her in a boarding school and instructs the boarding mistress to keep a sharp eye out for Hal. This the lady does, and succeeds in defeating a plan on the young people's part to elope. Hal and Sue are in black despair. Eventually Hal finds a way out. He hires a photographer to snap-shot Sue's father on the street and then, using the resulting photo as a guide, makes up to resemble papa. As papa, he fools that gentleman's coachman into driving him in the family coach to the boarding school, where Sue joins him. They journey to the parson's and are wed—and outwitted papa "comes around" all right.

THE THEFT OF THE DIAMONDS.—The first scene portrays a room in Mr. Allan's house. He is admiring a necklace of diamonds, when his nephew, Alfred Farley, a disreputable young man, having reached the end of his resources, applies to his uncle for the loan of some money, but he is refused. Spying the necklace, Farley tries to persuade his uncle to give it to him and, being refused again, he becomes angry and springs at his uncle in an endeavor to strangle him to gain possession of the coveted necklace. The effort is in vain, as Allan eludes him and angrily orders his from the house. We next see Mr. Allan at the theater dressing room of Margaret Hayes, a prima donna singer, where he presents her with the necklace just as she is leaving for the stage. Not wishing to leave it in the room, she twists it around her arm, and is followed out by Mr. Allan and her maid. In her absence Farley enters her dressing room and, after searching around finally discovers the empty box that had contained the necklace. Realizing that further search would be futile, he leaves and decides to go to her apartments and arriving there he lets himself down from the roof on a rope. Masked, he searches around the room and, being unsuccessful, hides behind a heavy curtain at the balcony door and awaits Miss Hayes' arrival from the theater. As she enters the room she notices the confusion, and detecting him she grasps the telephone and calls for Sherlock Holmes, the great detective, but before she can say anything he rushes from his hiding place and forces the telephone away from her. Sherlock Holmes, on the other end of the wire, hears only a scream, and immediately locating the number, rushes to her home. Farley in the meantime has escaped to the roof and when Holmes arrives and sees Miss Hayes unconscious, he notices the rope and quickly clambers up after the scoundrel. Farley from above notices this and loosens the rope, but Holmes luckily saves himself by clinging to the balcony which leads to the apartment of a gentleman and his servant. He explains his presence there and, with the aid of the men rushes to the roof in pursuit of the fugitive. Farley, from behind a chimney, shoots at the approaching men and after his revolver is emptied runs, but in jumping from one roof to another he falls and is captured and bound. He is then taken to the apartment of the singer, who has no difficulty in recognizing him as the thief and Farley is forced to give up the necklace and is turned over into the hands of the detective's assistants.

TSING FU, THE YELLOW DEVIL.—The first scene in this production opens in the office of a large music hall where several artists are waiting to see the manager. Among them is a celebrated acrobat, Joe Belling, and his sweetheart, the pretty singer, Daisy. Just then the door opens, and Tsing Fu, a Chinese magician, enters. Tsing Fu has known Daisy for some time, and has forced his attentions upon her, but has always been repulsed. Belling is asked to the manager's office, and Tsing Fu and Daisy are left alone. The former repeats his old games. When Belling comes back, he realizes the situation, and punishes the Chinaman by knocking him down, after which he leaves the office with Daisy. Very furious at the rough treatment, Tsing Fu swears revenge, and we see him next in one of the opium dens in the Chinese quarters, figuring out a plan. The same evening while Belling is doing his turn on the stage, the Chinaman noiselessly enters Daisy's dressing room and with the assistance of two other Chinamen, make off with her. As soon as Belling finds out what has happened, he questions Tsing Fu, but Tsing Fu pretends to know nothing. However, Belling does not believe him, and follows him secretly on his way home, little thinking that a trap is laid for him. Tsing Fu enters a house and Belling follows, but before doing so he sends a boy with a note to a well-known detective informing him where he has gone. As Belling appears in the door of the house he is overpowered, taken into a shed, and dropped through a trap door. The detective having received the note, appears disguised as a Chinaman and gains admission. He finds an old Chinaman all alone, and after overpowering him he succeeds in finding Belling. They both now release the Chinaman and pretend to leave the house, but wait outside to watch the Chinaman who leaves and quickly runs to Tsing Fu to warn him. The detective and Belling follow and with the help of a policeman the house is entered, and Daisy released, and Tsing Fu taken prisoner.

THE THEATER OF PHENOMENONS.—A film brimful of amusement for old and young. The phenomenal always attracts in this instance more than usually. The feats accomplished by the freaks employed at this unique playhouse would scarcely be credited as humanly possible unless actually witnessed. To see is to laugh, and to laugh uncontrollably throughout the performance. A source of great fun to the children, and a well of pure enjoyment for all lovers of satire.

AFTER THE FALL OF THE EAGLE.—All France is in a tumult—the fall of the great Empire is accomplished, and the reaction causes parties of rebels lay waste the whole nation, committing all manner of violence on their way.

It is at this period that our story opens. A body of rebels are seeking the life of General Dangu an officer of the fallen Emperor. The officer being pursued, takes refuge in a castle, a side door of which he finds open. He hurriedly explains the situation to the owner of the Castle, the Marquis La Roche, who immediately offers him his hospitality and protection. The rebels make their way to the castle and demand that the Marquis deliver up to them the General, for whose life they are thirsting. Their clamorings are in vain; the Marquis dismisses them with scorn. The mob retires, baffled, but immediately they begin to plot to unhouse their victim.

A short time later, therefore, the rebel leader hides himself in a wood near the castle and intercepts one of the maid-servants of the castle, whom he bribes to place a letter on a private desk of her mistress—a letter purporting to have been written by the young officer whom the Marquis is protecting. The maid is instructed to say, if questioned, that the General gave her the letter to be delivered to the lady of the castle. This letter, when discovered, bears the forged signature of the officer, and makes him appear a traitor to the good Marquis who has so graciously entertained him. The lady fervently acclaims her utter innocence, and that of the young officer, but the enraged Marquis will not be convinced. He sends word to the leader of the rebels that he has discovered that his guest is a traitor, and that he will be delivered to them at once. Then the Marquis seeks out the young officer and violently accuses him of that of which, of course, he knows nothing, ordering him at once from his premises. The young General immediately perceives the net in which he is entangled, and bravely faces his host: "Sir," says he, "I am innocent, as you will learn too late, of that with which you charge me; I am no craven. It is to death that you send me forth, and you shall see how a French officer can die!" The Marchioness weepingly pleads that the young officer shall not be sacrificed, but regardless of her entreaties, the brave man goes out to his death.

At that moment the maid rushes into the room, and hastily confesses the deception she has perpetrated. Upon hearing this, the Marquis flees with the wild hope of still saving the general—but, alas! he is too late. Even as he comes upon the scene, the former officer of the French Emperor's great army is borne down by a volley of shots from the rebel mob. The old Marquis rushes to raise the fallen body—but the life has fled—and as the truth of the great tragedy flashes upon him, the old Marquis is broken down with grief, and we leave him yearning tenderly, remorsefully over the prostrate remains of the man he might have saved!

THE POWERS COMPANY.

THE MAN WHO WAITED. Bob Stevens, a young farmer, is in love with Kate Jones, the daughter of his neighbor. Kate thinks a great deal of Bob until Langdon, a rich young New Yorker, comes to the farm of the Joneses by the advice of his physician for the benefit of his health. Langdon's gallant manners fascinate the girl, who falls in love with him. Kate's parents leave their home to visit friends at a distance. Langdon is singing a love song to Kate, who accompanies him on her guitar. The girl's charm makes Langdon forget that he has a wife who is suing him for a divorce. He embraces and kisses Kate. Bob enters and sees this and, thinking that the Easterner is trifling with the girl's affections, he sends for a minister and insists that as long as Langdon and the girl love each other the sooner they marry the better. Langdon permits the minister to marry him and the girl, whom he really loves, believing that his divorce from his wife has by this time been granted and that no trouble will ensue.

A week later Langdon receives a letter from his lawyer, telling him that the divorce has not been granted. Feeling sure that if Bob knows of his cowardly action it means death, he leaves Kate without a word. A few days later she receives a letter from Langdon telling her the facts and promising that if he is ever free from his wife he will come back to her. Old man Jones vows vengeance on Langdon, but Bob insists that the matter be left to him. Bob goes to New York. His only chance to locate Langdon is through Dr. Francis who introduced Langdon to the Jones family.

In a unique comedy scene Bob gets hold of a telegram from Langdon to the doctor asking the doctor to come to him at once. In several thrilling scenes Bob is seen following the doctor until he arrives at a small hotel in the mountains in which Langdon is lying ill. At last Bob is given an opportunity to deal out justice, in the crude Western manner, to the man who stole his sweetheart and made her an unhappy woman. He enters the house. He is seen at the door of Langdon's room. He draws his pistol and enters. Langdon is lying on the bed. Bob calls to him but receives no answer. A mightier hand than Bob's has taken Langdon's life. The doctors enter and Bob hears them declare that Langdon is dead.

Seven years pass. We see Kate playing with her little daughter. Bob enters and the child hugs and kisses him. In a unique manner the child brings together her mother and the man who waited.

THE SNAKE MAN.—A promising young gentleman, upon learning that a human snake is in demand at the local circus, proceeds to the Zoological Gardens, there to take lessons in the art of being a snake. He makes speedy progress and gradually finds himself getting deeper and deeper in the sea of trouble. After several exciting crawls down chimneys into houses and out again, the young snake proceeds to partake of a hearty lunch. After dining upon two lovers, several policemen and a number of passersby the snake goes to sleep. Then upon the horizon of P. C. Dinky Doo, 22, promotion looms sure and large. His marvelous brain evolves a scheme whereby to trap this destroyer of mankind. By charming the snake with the aid of a high pitched barrel organ he succeeds in capturing it. Shortly after the poor snake is seized with indigestion and one by one the lost lovers, policemen and passersby reveal themselves quite well and hearty.

RICO, THE JESTER.—Rico, the jester, is the laughing stock of all. He is seen first amusing the courties, by whom he is subjected to some rough horseplay. Throwing down his wand of office he goes off through the grounds, where he finds a handsome young lady weeping on a seat. He is touched with pity, and inquiring her trouble finds that she is blind. He makes up his mind to become her protector and escorts her to his dwelling. Here pity blossoms into love and both develop an affection for each other. It is indeed a strange attachment between the jester with his ungainly form and visage and the beautiful blind girl. He takes her for daily walks in the gardens, and on one occasion is observed by a party of gay sparks, who determine to get the girl away from him. With this end in view they pounce upon him and seize the girl. But luckily help is at hand, and an unexpected defender comes up in the person of a doctor, who is out walking. He, too, becomes enamored of the blind girl and sets himself to restore her sight, if possible. In this he succeeds, much to the terror of the jester, who fears that his ugliness will frighten her. In this surmise he proves correct. But love conquers all, and eventually the girl chooses him for her protector for life.

NANNINA.—A Black Hand gang have just picked another name from their long list of "marked men." Dr. Larcotti, a wealthy physician, being the man this time. Writing a letter demanding five thousand dollars, a young Italian named Tony is chosen to deliver it. Dr. Larcotti is just leaving his home when Tony hands him the letter; frightened, he hurries on his way. A few hours later, as the doctor is walking along the street, he sees a policeman arresting an Italian girl named Nannina for peddling without a license. The doctor intercedes for her, securing her release, and gives her his card. Nannina hurries home to tell her parents of the doctor's kind act. When her father, who is a member of the Black Hand gang, learns it was Dr. Larcotti who saved his daughter, he rushes to the gang telling them what has happened. The gang then orders the father to bring Nannina before them. When she appears they force her at the point of a revolver to write the doctor a note, telling him that she is sick and to come to her at once. Just as the gang is starting to take the note Nannina knocks over the lamp, plunging the den into darkness. Rushing out, she hurries to the doctor's home to warn him of his danger. One of the gang goes after her, bringing her back to the den. She and the doctor are then condemned to die within the next forty-eight hours. Bound hand and foot she is left upon the floor of the den. Tony, who has been picked to kill the doctor, forces an entrance to his home, where he arranges a bomb over a door which will explode when the doctor enters the room. Returning to the den, the taunts Nannina, telling her what he has done at the home of the doctor. Tony, who has been drinking, soon falls asleep. Nannina after a hard struggle, frees herself and again rushes to the home of Dr. Larcotti, reaching there just as he is about to enter the room where the bomb has been placed. As a reward for saving his life, the doctor adopts her as his daughter, giving her a home for the rest of her life.

A SHOT IN TIME.—Jealousy, which brings about so much trouble, is the basis of this story. Lillian, the pretty daughter of a snake hunter, is in conversation with her Mexican sweetheart, when a tally-ho, which holds a party of folks, stops at their door. One of the new arrivals, a fine looking chap, pays, according to the Mexican, over much attention to Lillian, and naturally attains for himself the ill will of Max. After the snake hunt the tally-ho departs, taking away all of the party. Frank leaves behind with Lillian a flower and many fond thoughts. The flower is rudely taken from her by Max and, when she resents the action, is saved from him by the Indian servant. Max goes among the rocks in search of rattlers, determining to end Frank's life with their deadly poison. His dastardly act is watched by the Indian, who follows him back to the hunter's house. Frank comes, bringing with him flowers for Lillian. She serves him with a drink and while he is watching her the Mexican empties into Frank's glass the poison which he had extracted and put into a vial. He then proposes a toast and Frank is about to respond to it when his glass is broken by a shot fired by the Indian who has been watching and has taken this means of preventing the crime. The Mexican tries to escape, but after an explanation is made by the Indian Max is bound and taken away. Frank and Lillian receive her father's blessing, so "all's well that ends well."

AMBROSIO—

AN UNWORTHY FIANCE.—The father of a young girl is seated by the fireside smoking his pipe and pondering over the happy future of his daughter, while she and her mother are busy preparing the wedding dress to be worn by herself on the forthcoming Easter. Everything seems serene until a wealthy traveler, who has fallen into a ravine, is brought into their hut to be cared for. Much excitement follows and with great difficulty the traveler is restored to consciousness again. A purse containing much money belonging to the stranger comes within reach of the girl's fiance, who cannot resist the temptation of becoming possessor of it. The theft is soon discovered and despite the fact that poverty reigns in the girl's home, the father refuses to give the hand of his daughter to such an unworthy man, and all happiness is turned into grief.

A SUDDEN TELEPHONE CALL.—A sudden telephone call is received at the police station, announcing that two burglars are pillaging in a rich mansion. The alarm gives cause to a series of laughable adventures. Two choice policemen, entrusted with the task of arresting the rogues, are finally made the victims of the burglars, who, after having knocked them about mercilessly, complete their work by forcing them into barrels, nailing the same securely. In an instant the two barrels liven up and start shaking to and fro and finally begin a furious race through the streets, mounting stairs and walls until they by chance reach the very police station from which the policemen were detailed. The thieves, having followed the course of the barrels, advise the police authorities by telephone that the scoundrels so much sought for are contained therein. The following scene shows the officers opening the barrels and the discovery of their companions, which, naturally, brings about many ludicrous situations.

ITALA—

THE SERVANT AND THE TUTOR.—Worried by the thought of his young daughter being left alone in the world, an old man decides to commend her to a man whom he thinks to be a sincere friend. This he does, and handing him the key of his desks asks that he execute his will and become the girl's tutor. Not long after the old man passes away, at which time the tutor looks through the papers left and discovers that by withholding them he can easily possess himself of the fortune. The daughter is greatly distressed to learn from her tutor that her father died in debt. An old servant, who is not so easily hoodwinked, prevails upon his mistress to pry open the desk, in which he feels they will find some papers. They are disturbed in doing this by the entrance of the tutor. The servant has, however, succeeded in extracting the documents and thrusts them behind the desk, leaving the envelope in sight. The tutor has him arrested, but upon his release some years later, he returns to the house and when night falls enters through a window. He makes his way to the desk and finds the documents still intact. A passerby, who saw the servant's entrance into the house, gives alarm. He is discovered by the police and the tutor, but when the telltale papers are displayed instead of the servant's arrest the tutor is taken prisoner.

NESTOR FILMS.

THE COWBOY-PREACHER.—Although a somewhat stern father, John Dentworth aimed to be a just one, but now he felt at a loss just how to proceed. The mortgage which Jake Schroder held would be foreclosed to-day unless Jane consented to marry the young man, and that she would take Schroder in preference to the Easterner, Bob Henderson, Dentworth doubted most seriously. Then if she refused—what?

Besides lifting the mortgage, would he not be securing his daughter's future happiness if he forced her to accept Schroder? An honest, wholesome, good-hearted young man whom everybody liked, and who, Dentworth argued, would surely make a better husband than the Easterner.

At this juncture his daughter appeared and he braced himself for the ordeal, and an ordeal it proved, for Jane, as he had feared, absolutely refused to obey even his commands and he found that instead of going to her room, as he had ordered, she had evaded him with the aid of her brother's hat and coat and hurried out to meet Bob Henderson.

Fortunately he and Schroder discovered the lovers before they had an opportunity to get away. So, sending Jane to the house, he struck Bob a stunning blow with the butt of his whip and would have repeated his attack had not Schroder interfered.

The Easterner, however, bore him no grudge, but hastened to his hotel to await Tim's arrival, as Jane had promised to send her brother to him should she need his aid.

And need it she did—sooner than she had expected. For both her father's anger and Schroder's jealousy had been aroused in finding her with Bob, so that her final appeal to them had fallen upon deaf ears, and she found herself locked in her room to await their cowboy-preacher.

Bob had, therefore, scarcely arrived at his hotel and gotten horses in readiness for immediate flight when Tim came panting up with the note from Jane which she had succeeded in throwing out of the window to him. And though he and Tim made all possible speed, they would scarcely have arrived on time, had not the cowboy-preacher insisted on removing his "preacher outfit" and solemnly hiding his Bible before he would accept a drink, and then quite solemnly turning back into the "preacher" before he would allow the prospective bride to be admitted.

As it was Jane had hardly gotten to the bottom of the ladder placed at her window when her father appeared above. But although she and Bob had had but a few moment's start, they succeeded in getting out of sight, dismounting and sending their horses adrift to throw her enraged father and Schroder off the scent, and stealing back to the house, where, as they expected, they found the cowboy-preacher. For the moment Dentworth and Schroder galloped away in pursuit the cowboy-preacher all at once became all cowboy. However, having finished the bottle, he again donned his clerical robes and, feeling in a jovial mood with the world in general, Bob and Jane, aided by Tim and another cowboy, had little difficulty in persuading him to perform the marriage ceremony. Only the mortgage remained now to worry the young bride. But Schroder, upon finding he had lost, lived up to his reputation of big-heartedness and actually insisted upon Dentworth accepting the mortgage as Jane's wedding gift.

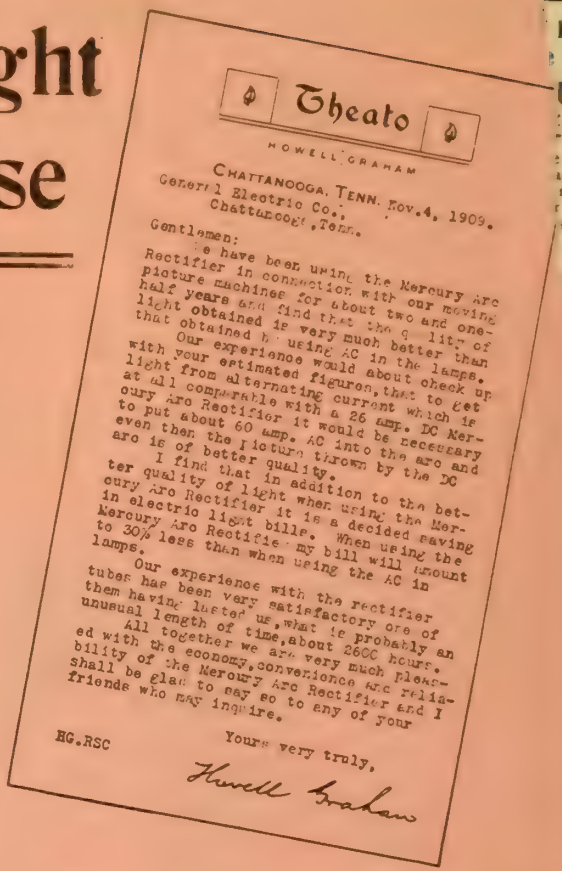
Better Qualtiy of Light 30% Saving in Expense

Mr. Howell Graham, a prominent moving picture man of Chattanooga, Tenn., got these results in his theatre by using the—

G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifier

Read the letter in which he heartily endorses this device.



Theato

HOWELL GRAHAM

CHATTANOOGA, TENN. Nov.4, 1909.

General Electric Co.,
Chattanooga, Tenn.

Gentlemen:

We have been using the Mercury Arc Rectifier in connection with our moving picture machines for about two and one-half years and find that the quality of light obtained is very much better than that obtained by using AC in the lamps. Our experience would about check up with your estimated figures, that to get light from alternating current which is at all comparable with a 25 amp. DC Mercury Arc Rectifier it would be necessary to put about 60 amp. AC into the arc and even then the picture thrown by the DC arc is of better quality.

I find that in addition to the better quality of light when using the Mercury Arc Rectifier it is a decided saving in electric light bills. When using the Mercury Arc Rectifier my bill will amount to 30% less than when using the AC in lamps.

Our experience with the rectifier tubes has been very satisfactory one of them having lasted us, what is probably an unusual length of time, about 2600 hours.

All together we are very much pleased with the economy, convenience and reliability of the Mercury Arc Rectifier and I shall be glad to say so to any of your friends who may inquire.

HG.RSC

Yours very truly,

Howell Graham

None But INDEPENDENT EXHIBITORS Can Show These Great IMP Films

Imp films are enlightening the whole film world. Imp films are doing more to cause exhibitors and exchanges to assert their independence and liberty than any other cause or factor in the business. Imp films are of such unvarying high quality, of such supreme excellence that the mere announcement "IMP NIGHT" in front of a theater suffices to pack the house to the limit of its capacity. Imp films are the most sensational success on record. Do you know of any other that leaped to the top in such a marvelously short time? Read a few of the bushels of congratulatory letters and telegrams received from those who use the Incomparable Imps:—

W. F. Neil, Crescent Theater, Chattanooga, says:—"Congratulate you on splendid IMP pictures. Satisfied my receipts increased ten to fifteen per cent. on days I exhibit IMP films."

P. P. Craft, Motion Picture Outfitter, Washington, D. C., says:—"Congratulations on the superior quality of IMP films. Quality, like murder, will out!"

King & Gaynor, Superba Theater, Delaware, Ohio:—"IMP films are certainly it. Mother Love is conceded by all to have been the best picture play ever shown in Delaware. More power to you."

Letter to Allen Amusement Co., Calgary, Alta, from The Orpheum, Edmonton, Alberta:—"More than pleased with your service, the IMP film being equal to the best. The staging of Coquette's Suitors (IMP) was excellent."

W. G. Spurrier, Seattle, Wash., says:—"Have set aside Monday night as IMP night. Yesterday was the biggest Monday I have had since I opened."

Harry Weiss, Menominee, Mich., says:—"Every time we get an IMP we whitewash the town. Strange, but true, every IMP is better than the other."

Next Comes "The Rosary"

(Released Monday, April 11. Length, 950 Feet.

We release this just to prove that our film d'art department didn't drop dead after producing "Mother Love." It is a strictly high class story, beautifully staged, cleverly conceived and daringly executed. Look for the synopsis elsewhere in this issue. Begin right now to tell your exchange that you want "The Rosary." Beg. Entreat. Insist!

And "The Ace of Hearts"

(Released Thursday, April 14. Length, 980 Feet.)

Three men, down and out, draw cards. The holder of the ace of hearts is to insure his life in favor of the other two and then shuffle off this mortal coil. And right there is where we fool everybody. The story takes a new twist because a girl enters into it. Your patrons will go home with a soft spot in their hearts for you and your theater! Demand!

Two weeks after release and still receiving congratulations upon our subject entitled: "COMPANY D TO THE RESCUE." That's going some. We doubtless could fill this publication were we to insert a copy of every letter received. It is our aim to give our patrons the highest degree of excellence, as will be demonstrated by the coming offerings, especially Friday's "Bison" release, "Red Wing's Loyalty." We predict for this release long lived memory, because of its superiority, having all previous films manufactured by this company beaten to a stand still. This goes for "Company D to the Rescue" as well. Don't be "fleeced;" there is a "bear" chance that you will be unless you get the "Bison." This looks like a "bull" but it isn't.

WHEN IN DOUBT PLAY A TRUMP!!!

Right this very minute there are several thousand moving picture exhibitors who are wondering why in blazes their business isn't so good as it was. They try and scheme and plan all sorts of things to boost their receipts but there's nothing doing in the boost line. They overlook the heart and soul and liver of their business——GOOD FILMS. They think they can fool the people into coughing up five-cent pieces for junk. Now then, let me tell you something you've got to believe. The people are watching this film fight like hawks. They want to see the Independents win out. Nothing will tickle them more than to find a theatre that is showing good, smart, classy Independent pictures. Exhibitors who are using my film service have sent me bushels of letters which they received from their patrons, lauding their shows and encouraging the use of Independent pictures. It is a straw showing the direction of the wind. Heed it. Find out what your people want——not what you think you can make them like. Follow the line of least resistance. Slip me a note.

The Educated Classes and the Moving Picture.

It cannot be pretended that as yet the moving picture in any of its phases has attracted the sympathetic notice and patronage of the educated classes. Not that educated people do not go to moving picture shows; they do, as we know by actual observation. We are speaking generally. But it is rare that one hears the subject of the moving picture discussed by educated people with the same amount of intelligence and knowledge as they discuss aeroplanes, motor boats, automobiles, and some of the other scientific wonders of the present day.

This reflection was suggested to us only last week by a conversation we had with a well-known medical practitioner in New York City. We discovered that in his hospital work he used ordinary or stationary photography. The conversation then naturally drifted towards the moving picture with which it appeared our friend had only a nodding acquaintance. Before we parted, however, we had succeeded in arousing his interest to such an extent that he is never likely to relinquish it. We pointed out to him, to his surprise, that the moving picture was used for scientific purposes, including surgery, and also for industrial purposes, quoting many instances. We shall not forget his astonishment when we informed him that right here in New York City, and not long ago, one could see a moving picture of the works in progress on the Isthmus of Panama. His regret at not having seen that picture was extremely great.

As we are always on the alert for signs indicative of the attitude of the public towards the moving picture, we derived great pleasure from this conversation with a well educated and intelligent man. Once the educated classes grasp the idea that the moving picture offers day by day other pabulum than the merely comic or dramatic, a large body of influential support will be switched over to the cause of moving picture progress. For it is unquestioned that in these days of thirst for knowledge, enormous sections of the community are only too ready to be instructed and educated by means of motion photographs. Take this case of the Panama Canal. Hundreds of thousands of people in the United States were able to see the actual condition of the work and thus could judge how far the government is justified in its policy. We could multiply these cases indefinitely.

We have a distinct object in writing this article, and that is to urge the exhibitor never to lose an opportunity of enlisting the support of the educated classes in his immediate neighborhood. This can be done in various ways, by advertising, by circularizing, and, above all things, by personal advocacy. There is no doubt that if the better classes of the community are taught to see that the picture is something more than a mere trick for entertaining young people, much good will be done towards solidifying the position of the picture in public favor.

"Catalogue of Educational Motion Pictures."—Such is the modest title on the cover of a 336-page catalogue just issued by George Kleine, of Chicago and New York. It has been skillfully and carefully compiled and embraces the widest range of subjects, covering all the educational films that have yet been published. Supplements will be issued from time to time to keep the record up to date. It is a trite remark to say that this catalogue fills a long felt want. It represents months of labor and has been a costly undertaking, but it reflects credit on the compilers and is a monument of glory not only to its publisher but to the moving picture business as a whole.

The Eternal Feminine and Her Hat.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

Last Sunday, being Easter Sunday, I, being a mere man, passed some little time in studying and admiring the hats of the ladies. Not for me to criticise these marvelous confections; not for me to inquire whether the fair wearers are comfortable under them; not for me to inquire what they cost, and still less, thank God! my duty to pay for them! That way bankruptcy lies. And as I looked, a little incident concerning these eternal hats came in my mind.

It was on an occasion when Mr. Lyman H. Howe showed his moving pictures in the New York Hippodrome last year, I had a seat in the company of a number of ladies, and I was the silent witness of one of the most heartrending pieces of feminine drama it is possible for mere man to contemplate. On my right sat a lady well prepared for the occasion. She was expensively gowned; she was a majestic figure; and handsome, I suppose, if I am any judge of beauty. She looked as fit as a fiddle—and, by heavens, she wore a stunning hat! I won't attempt to describe it; suffice it to say that if I were that handsome woman of commanding figure, it is just the kind of hat I should like to wear.

Well, she and her friends were just settling themselves down for the coming pictures, when, from two rows behind us, that is, right at the back of the theater, came a sweet, small feminine voice—cold, clear, precise in its tones of womanly envy: "Madam, I must trouble you to remove your hat." The wearer of the hat affected not to hear. "Madam," continued the other lady in the same remorseless tone, "will you please remove that hat?"

There was an awful pause. I ventured to turn my eyes to my right and I saw in the offending woman's face an expression of pure, suppressed, tigress-like passion. "Must I?" she half whispered to herself without turning. "Must I?" she repeated. "You must," sweetly said the jealous tormentor at the back. So the victim did. Slowly, but in a very dignified manner, the beautiful hat was removed, disclosing what appeared to me, though I am no judge of these matters, a very beautiful head of hair, very beautifully dressed. I glanced round at the objecting lady. There was no glare of triumph in her face at all. And here's the reason. She was a small woman. The lady in front of her was a tall woman, and even with the removal of her hat her rival got little or no better view of the stage. It was all pure feminine jealousy and feline spite. No more; no less.

The lady's hat plays a large part in moving picture life. Exhibitors throw slides on the screen adjuring the women to remove their hats in order that the "poor fellow behind" may get a better view of the pictures. As a rule the poor fellow does not care very much. I mean the poor fellow of the male variety. It is the poor fellow of the feminine kind who wants that hat off, especially if it is a nice one. No triumph so keen and exciting as that of the woman who contemptuously downs the glory of another woman's headgear. Is this not so, ladies? Are you not all envious of one another in what you wear? Isn't it so when, at a moving picture theater, you see a friend with a handsomer hat than yours? Isn't it pleasing to you to have her remove that hat?

As a matter of fact the hat question need not be a serious one, or at any rate of vital importance, if all moving picture theaters had their floors constructed on a slant, so that it would be easy to see over the heads of those in front of you. On the other hand, there is the men's point of view to be considered. I am bound to say that I never cursed so heartily in all my life as on a recent occasion when I sat in a church. The ladies' hats in front of me absolutely precluded my view of altar and preacher and thereby imperilled my immortal soul.

Still, for all that, women must be considered, and the more you consider them in the moving picture theater the more persistent they will be in their patronage. I do not know whether it is so in this country, but across the Atlantic some parts of theaters are reserved where women may wear their hats, especially at matinees. Then, if mere man goes to these places, he takes the goods as he finds them, and has no right to object. Speaking generally, I rather like to see a nice hat on a woman, so long as it does not interfere with my view of things. In America the hat, of course, is a work of art, a thing of beauty and a joy forever; therefore, we all like to look on the thing. Though we do not like to have to pay for it. Do we, brothers?

Of course, I assume it is impossible to do otherwise in the ordinary moving picture theater but insist upon the removal of ladies' hats, but if it can be so devised that women can wear their hats during the performance, it will be all the better. For, once a woman has got her hat on for a particular occasion she does not like to have to take it off.

Before I wrote this article I put this question to several ladies of my acquaintance who bought Easter hats. I said, "My dear Mrs. ——— (all my lady acquaintances are married, of course) when I next have the pleasure of escorting you to the moving picture theater, and you dress yourself especially for the occasion, will you care to take your hat off?" With wonderful unanimity they replied much in these terms: "Oh, dear no, Mr. Bedding, certainly not. We go out in our hats to wear them; not for the purpose of taking them off. We think you moving picture men should study us a little more."

And that is the point of this article, gentlemen of the exhibiting business. Study the ladies. Not merely in respect of their hats, but in every other possible detail that you can. Study the ladies and their children. Have ladies' matinees if you like, and ladies' sections of the auditorium, but study the ladies. Do not let it be said, as it has been said many times in my hearing, by the ladies, "Oh, I would often run into a picture show, but really I do not care to remove my hat." Dear friend exhibitor, let the lady keep her hat on as much as possible and you will make a permanent friend of her. Never mind mere man, who counts for comparatively little in the game. Where woman goes he will go, you may be sure; so by pandering to the lady you will assure the support of both. Here endeth the lesson.

Our Vancouver (B. C.) correspondent writes: "It may interest you to know that there have been several really swell moving picture theaters erected in Vancouver since I wrote you last. It was only last night that I dropped into one I had not been to before, and I was surprised at the way these pictures have improved. The theater was a very big one, but was simply packed, and the scheme of ventilation was such that there was not a suggestion of foul air at all."

In the columns of the "Bioscope," an English publication, we note that moving pictures are being used in new and novel fields. The Woman's National Health Association, Chambers street, London, are illustrating their health lectures by means of moving pictures. The young mother is being taught how to wash and dress her baby, also how to prepare its food, as well as how best to keep baby's food uncontaminated. The same medium, moving pictures, is being used by a famous prize-fighter to study the various blows and ring tactics of his opponent in a coming battle. Truly the animated picture's field of usefulness is broadening.

The Workingman's Theater.

By Jane Elliott Snow.

The reason why the motion picture show is the workingman's theater is because it comes within the limits of both his time and means. The theater proper is held at late hours, unless it be the matinee, which comes when all working people are engaged in their legitimate occupations. It is rarely that a person who works from eight to ten hours a day feels like spending the evenings up to 10 or 12 o'clock at a place of amusement. But at a picture show one can step in and spend an hour very delightfully, and in many cases very profitably. Then the cost of the thing appeals to people with limited incomes. Few men with such incomes would think they could afford to take their wives and children to a place of amusement, where the least expense would be from twenty-five to fifty cents each; but they could take them where they only had to pay five or ten cents each.

Think what it means to take a trip through the Alps, through Northern Africa, or into the tropics where bananas and oranges grow! Think what it means to visit Montreal, when its ice palace is in all its glory and Winter sports are at their height! Think what it means to go to British Columbia and see them cutting down those mammoth trees of centuries' growth; to visit Yosemite Valley, with its wealth of groves, of cascades and waterfalls, all of which can frequently be seen at a motion picture show. This is an age of travel. People in this country think nothing of making a tour of Europe; they take the Mediterranean trip and visit Spain, Italy, Greece, Egypt and the Holy Land; scores go around the world each year. But while these few score, and few hundreds are traveling abroad, the thousand remain at home, some perforce, others from choice. To these latter the motion picture show opens up an opportunity to see, for a few pennies, and in a short time, all that their (so-called) more favored citizens have seen at the cost of much money and great fatigue.

This year of grace, 1910, will witness the great "Passion Play," at Oberammergau. Hundreds of people will go to see it. But, while the hundreds will go, the thousands will stay at home. But the stay-at-homes will have the privilege of seeing the play reproduced in motion pictures, for the sacrifice of an hour's time and five or ten cents in money. The same may be said of other great plays, great operas which are always expensive, and people pay prices to attend them equal, if not greater, than the sum paid to hear Dr. Cook or Com. Peary tell how they didn't find the North Pole.

Not everyone reads our great masterpieces of literature; they have not the time, nor the eyes; in some instances they can get many glimpses into such literature by attending the motion picture plays.

"Launcelot and Elaine," "Jean Valjean," scenes from Shakespeare, and other great literary works are making their rounds of the world to-day. Yes, the motion picture show is here and it is here to stay. It is a great, a wonderful thing, and should one of our forefathers, who left the earth in the early days of the horse cars, come back to us, what would surprise him the most? Would it be the electric motors, the automobiles or the airships? Would it be the telephones or the phonographs? No, none of these things. It would be that little picture, a few feet square, thrown upon the canvas, where men, women and children are seen moving about, running, falling, climbing; where horses are galloping and entire trains of cars are rushing along.

The presentation of these pictures involves a vast amount of labor and expense. They require great talent, great ability. Many of the firms that do this work keep in constant employ many people, many actors and stage managers. They have a great variety of scenery, for many of their scenes are little plays in pantomime. Then these little plays must be first written, and as the play houses are so numerous and the changes of plays so frequent, there must of necessity spring up a demand for many original scenes and situations. What part the general public will take in this work remains to be seen. Some of the film producing firms ask for contributions and promise good pay for those accepted. But when we think of the staff of actors, artists and doubtless geniuses and wits that the larger firms keep constantly employed, it looks as if the chances for outsiders are very meager.

It is no small matter to write a play that must be produced in pantomime. Some of the leading writers are engaged in the work. One firm announces that they have arranged with Richard Harding Davis to produce plays exclusively for them. And readers who know Richard Harding Davis only by his description of a "London Fog" know what he can do with his pen. Carolyn Wells is another writer mentioned as one of those who has written pantomime plays.

Yes, the motion picture show is here. It is to a great extent educational, as well as enjoyable. So let us hope that it will establish and maintain a high standard of excellence in every way, and that it will eventually have a place in our schools, and in all our penal, reformatory and philanthropic institutions, where both amusement and instruction are so much needed, and where in no way can they be so happily combined as in the motion picture.

Speed the March of Improvement.

By Dorothy Appleton.

The chief cause of so many attacks upon moving picture houses is the fact that managers show so many pictures of a wildly sensational character, which undoubtedly please a certain doubtful class—those who revel in such stories as "Lantern-jawed Bob," "Gunpowder Jim," etc.

Why do managers play down to such people? These degenerates are in the minority of substantial audiences. The majority do not enjoy stories of crime and immorality. To look at insanity is most distressing. It is a living death. Nothing is sadder than reason dethroned. Murder is horrible, revolting, yet people are killed before our eyes every day in these theaters. Life is full of stories of intense, dramatic interest, stories of real people. Then why can we not have such gripping scenes oftener on the screen? Those people who can be relied upon as regular patrons do not relish rank, worn out melodrama of crime and cowboys. It is a trite excuse for such films that "villainy is punished and virtue rewarded." Film producers should give us more pictures of human interest—the world is full of real comedies, dramas and tragedies, and so few are written for the screen. In order to see one story of the sort of people who exist outside of a film, we are compelled to sit through miles of scenes which are the same old agonizing situations turned about.

Film makers can help in this much needed improvement by releasing more stories of the right sort. This industry is young yet, and it will only be profitable when it does not arouse criticism, which is in a measure deserved.

The Moving Picture World would like to hear from exhibitors as to what were the most popular films they have shown during the past three months. Which have received the most applause or have been most favorably commented upon by the public? Which have they expressed a wish to see the second time?

Management of the Theater.

By S. L. Rothapfel.

A very important item to be considered in careful management is the arrangement of programs. By this I mean the order in which the respective reels and songs are run. The first thing to be considered is that the performance shall have a beginning and an ending. It should be arranged, as far as possible, to offer a complete and consecutive presentation, just as though the patrons were watching a dramatic or any other performance. The present day helter-skelter methods of many exhibitors sends their audiences away in a bewildered and dissatisfied frame of mind, without any very clear idea of just what they have seen. If the programs are arranged with care and worked up to the psychological point, the audiences will go away contented and carry with them a definite recollection of the entertainment. They would come again and again, and that is what every successful manager desires to create, a steady patronage that will allow him to build up an average that will hold day in and day out regardless of conditions. Of course, this will be found difficult and in some cases will require ingenuity on the part of the manager to accomplish this end. In most cases, however, the careful exchange will assort the program in such a way that it will require only a little extra work to achieve success.

Take the following subjects for illustration:

"Industries of Southern California"—Selig.
"Ranson's Folly"—Edison.
"The Newlyweds"—Biograph.

This I consider an ideal program and could be very easily arranged to make a complete performance. The first reel, we will say, is the Selig. This picture, on account of being an industrial and somewhat of a novelty, will hold your audience in nice shape until the finish. We will then suppose you have a song that will fit nicely. We are then ready for the Edison, which is a splendid dramatic reel and could be made much of. It will appeal especially to those who have read Mr. Davis' delightful story, and even those who have not read it will understand it perfectly as the details are worked out very cleverly. A glance at the faces of your audience will show you now that they are in a pleasant mood and you can imagine what the result will be when you next show them "The Newlyweds." Your audience will leave their seats all smiles and satisfaction. Suppose, on the other hand, you had run the Edison after the Biograph; the hilarity caused by "The Newlyweds" would rob the Edison of some of its most dramatic incidents and before the picture could command undivided attention the best part of it would already be on your take-up. Or, suppose that you had run the industrial picture anywhere else but first, either of the other two pictures would detract from its true value and the chances are that your audience would be rather fidgety waiting for the next reel.

To accomplish results read carefully the snyopsis in your Moving Picture World and derive therefrom the exact story, and then use your own common sense. No set rule can be laid down for arranging your programs in motion pictures. You must use judgment.

Another thing I want to call attention to is the fact that not one minute during the entire performance should your music cease. Open with a waltz in a lively tempo and use same during small intermissions, swinging into score arranged for pictures on signal from operator, otherwise you will have a break in your performance that will glare right out and make a complete fizzle of a carefully arranged program. The music should be so arranged that not a moment is lost in changing from one theme to another. Then again always have your audience exit with a good march in the liveliest kind of tempo, or the chorus of a song that has made a hit, repeating until the last person has passed out of the theater. After a small intermission, of say, five minutes, you can start your show right over again.

THE SERIOUSNESS OF COMEDY.

Natural fun is a spontaneous effervescence of good humor, unexpected or unintentional in its outcome and effect. This is an entirely different proposition to acting funny to order. Try it. It is not as easy as you think. Just as soon as people know you are trying to be funny, they become hypercritical and take you seriously. The trouble is to make them forget that you are trying to be funny. To act funny to order and make it appear natural or spontaneous is indeed a serious matter.

This was the beginning of the subject of discussion with one of the Vitagraph directors, who has met with remarkable success in the directing of comedies. In the direction of a drama the actors can inspire themselves with its seriousness, it is evident and unmistakable and the sense of seriousness is more general in the public disposition, therefore more generally understood; the sense of the humorous is more obscure and less developed; to get it across to the audience it must appear natural and strike them as the real thing. The director of a comedy must work very hard to get the actors into the spirit of the comedy and then drill them up and into a funny situation. They have got to exaggerate without caricaturing; to emphasize without burlesquing. It is a continual anxiety on the part of the director to go the limit without overstepping it, a constant watchfulness to go so far and no farther.

Every character in characteristics and makeup is a study; to avoid offensiveness, the Frenchman must not be a freak, the German not a ridicule, the Irishman not distasteful, just pronounced enough to make them naturally funny. Contrasts or opposites must be introduced with care and judgment. The thin woman and the fat man, the tall man and the short woman, all must be weighed and measured within the scale of possibility and effect. Climaxes and consequences must be logical and feasible as well as sensibly funny.

The source of all humor is gravity and here again the contrasted seriousness of purpose in the characters plays an important part to intensify the fun; if the intention of the actors to be funny were evident, the result would be lost. The fun must appear unexpectedly and accidental. This deduction brings us back to our original proposition, that it is a serious matter to be funny and the seriousness of comedy acting and directing is a matter of deeper thought and consideration than it appears..

Mr. R. Schultz, manager of the Thompson Company, who are about to open the Washington Theater, 501 East 171st street, this city, after spending several weeks in making examination of moving picture machines, current savers, etc., has placed an order with J. H. Hallberg, 30 Greenwich avenue, New York, for the following:

No. 1 Motiograph moving picture machine, combined with double dissolving stereopticon. The lamps for this machine will be controlled by the "Hallberg" Automatic Electric Economizer for double lamp outfit, so arranged that when the lamps are used for dissolving stereopticon each lamp gets 30 to 35 amperes, and when the lower lamp is used for moving picture projection, it will operate with about 60 amperes at the arc, especially designed for projection at a distance of 100 feet.

The Economizer will operate on 208 volt 60 cycles alternating current and the saving guaranteed is over 80 per cent. on the current bill. There will also be a complete electric ventilating equipment, 4,000 candle power flaming arc lamps for this theater, which is scheduled to open within two weeks' time.

ALLIANCE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE IN SESSION.

Projected Sales Company Seeks to Regulate the Business of the Independents.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance was held in the Hotel Imperial, in this city, during the week and is still in session. The only business transacted, as given out by Secretary Swanson up to the hour of our going to press, was the election of Mr. J. E. Brulatour as president, the admission of two manufacturers—the Victor Film Manufacturing Company and the United Film Manufacturing Company, both of Chicago. That city was also selected as the next place of meeting, on May 6 and 7.

There was the usual amount of hot air talk in the meeting room and in the lobbies and also much scheming and plotting. But it all simmered down to a discussion of a new combination in the field which had been quietly working for some time to perfect an organization.

This new factor (which someone likened to the Patents Company without the patents) is a duly incorporated company bearing the title of The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company. The officers are: Carl Laemmle, president; Adam Kessell, Jr., vice-president; Charles O. Baumann, treasurer; Thomas D. Cochrane, secretary. The active management of the Sales Company will be in the hands of Thos. D. Cochrane and C. O. Baumann. We have been unable to see a copy of the articles of incorporation or to get a connected statement as to the methods and projects of this Sales Company, but we have been asured by each of its officers individually that its object is not personal graft but the bettering and solidifying of the film business as a whole and the elimination of evils that the Alliance has been unable to cope with.

For example, the comprehensive and succinct by-laws of the Alliance provided for fines upon members who sold to non-members, but this was openly winked at and manufacturers, and even Alliance officials, were quite willing to pay such fines and pocket a profit. A heavier penalty was needed to hold in check people who boasted of being law breakers. This the Sales Company proposes to do by controlling the source of supply. No attempt will be made to eliminate any manufacturer or exchange or coerce them into the ranks of the Sales Company. A form of regulations will be submitted to each Independent manufacturer and exchange at present doing business. If a manufacturer signs and does not live up to his agreement the Sales Company will not handle his product. In the case of a refractory exchange the supply of films will be cut off. True, the Alliance provided for such cases, but the secretary had no control over the marketable commodity.

The plan, in short, as outlined to us, is that all Independent films, both home and foreign make, should be marketed through this Sales Company, who would exact a commission for their services sufficient to cover the operating expenses. This would give the exchange man only one account to deal with and also the manufacturer, who, relieved of the worries of distribution, could give more attention to perfecting his product.

Another feature which commends the Sales Company idea is that the manufacturer must submit his film to them one or two weeks prior to release. It is to be inspected on regular days by the manufacturers or their representatives, and no film that is not up to a certain standard and receives the majority vote of approval will be accepted. We are heartily in favor of any move towards the improvement of quality and we believe that the competitive aspect of this proposition will have a good effect upon the manufacturers.

Some such holding company was inevitable if the business was to be safeguarded for those who have large interests at stake. Thus the manufacturer can feel more secure, the exchanges will be certain of regular shipments, the exhibitor will know that quality will be maintained and improved and we believe that the general effect, if it is carried out, will be beneficial.

The articles of agreement will be submitted to each Independent manufacturer and exchange on April 4 and it is proposed that they go into effect on April 18.

One element of success is still lacking—unanimity. Those manufacturers who have not been consulted in the matter naturally feel slighted and cannot get over the feeling that their product will not stand a fair show. The Sales Company say this is absurd. But we have still to be shown.

A counter proposition that all manufacturers and exchanges be given the opportunity of subscribing to the stock of a holding company was offered. This, the promoters of the Sales Company pointed out, would only lead to dissension and delays as had been proven over and over again in former Independent protective associations and Alliances that would not ally and could not protect.

Reports were current that other manufacturers had signed up with the Imp and Bison Companies, but personal investigation proved this to be false; although several said they were open to conviction, but had not yet seen the articles of agreement. If it can be shown that these will not give any unfair advantage or power to the two promoters of the Sales Company, we believe most if not all of the manufacturers will be with them. To touch on one point, the voting on the acceptance or quality of any manufacturer's product: If each release means a vote this would give the two promoting concerns a majority vote at once. If votes are limited to one for each company no objection could be raised. It may require some drastic measures to establish a standard of quality, but if absolute fairness prevails, the results can only work for the greatest good to the greatest number, which is what The Moving Picture World stands for and will support.

THANHOUSER RELEASES FRIDAY.

At the request of a majority of the exchanges, the Thanhouser Company have changed their release day to Friday, as there was only one other release on that day. This shows a disposition on their part to work in harmony with their customers and competitors for the general welfare.

THOSE HATS.

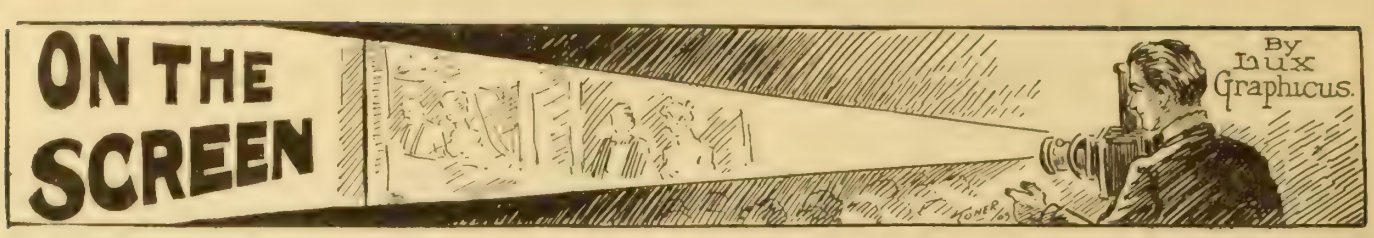
By F. H. Richardson.

In Atlanta, Ga., the city authorities have passed an ordinance compelling women to remove their headgear in theaters, and what is more, they are enforcing it to the letter. And now come certain managers of moving picture theaters demanding the annullment of the law, else they threaten to attempt its defeat in the courts on constitutional grounds Their reason for this remarkable position is that women are staying away from their houses rather than remove their hats. Now, the writer cannot possibly agree with the Atlanta managers in their unique position. He holds that both men and women should be obliged to remove their hats or else leave the theater. When a manager sells me a ticket, it is supposedly a guarantee that I will see a show, not someone's hat. If from any cause the show was not put on, the manager would promptly refund the price of admission; but he sells you a ticket and by allowing ladies (?) to retain their hats to all intents and purposes does not put on a show, so far as you are concerned. I place the question mark after the word "ladies" advisedly. The word "lady" presupposes a woman of some degree of refinement who will have at least some regard for the rights of others and who is not so unutterably selfish as to be willing to spoil the pleasure of others simply because she is too lazy to take off her hat. That is plain talk, but it expresses the facts. The manager who sells me a ticket and then allows some other patron to completely hide the stage, or curtain, from my view during the entire show, has operated a swindle. He has accepted my money, but has (so far as I am concerned) given no show in return. In Atlanta the women might, for a time, cease to attend the theaters as often as they did before (that is to say, some of them might), but it won't last very long, believe me, especially if convenient mirrors be installed.

Carl Laemmle is in town and advises us that he has dispatched an agent to establish depots for Imp films in the leading European cities.

Block & Schumacher have opened a thoroughly fireproof theater, the "Central," 63d street and First avenue. Licensed films, refined vaudeville and illustrated songs.

Miss Lawrence, the Imp leading lady, received a great ovation at St. Louis last week. The St. Louis papers gave columns to the event and next week we hope to find space for a record of this unique and clever stunt of the press agent.



"He died learning." This is the inscription on the tombstone of a great historian, who lies buried at Mentone, by the Mediterrranean Sea. The tomb and the inscription are due to the devotion of the historian's wife. I often think of this lady with gratitude because she has perpetuated a sentiment that is rather a favorite of mine—the sentiment being, that while we live and learn, we live to learn, as the historian of whom I am writing and thinking, John Richard Green, did throughout his useful life.

Not a day passes but what I learn something about the moving picture. I do not know it all. As the result of fourteen years' association with moving picturedom, I have learned a little about the picture and its business and I want to learn more. What I know has been the result of work—that is, study and observation. The consequence is that, having a perfectly open mind, and a receptive one, I am constantly adding to my knowledge of a subject which is a fascinating one from every aspect, except, perhaps, the purely commercial one.

I learned something this week that interested me very much and I want to interest my readers in it, namely, that it is possible for a book of 336 pages to deal exclusively with the moving picture in only one of its aspects, and that the educational! The educational side of the moving picture has always appealed to me. It appealed to me ten or eleven years ago when I wrote the history of animated photography in another publication. It appeals to me even more so today when I realize the enormous strides which are being, and have been, made in using the moving picture in the dissemination of knowledge.

The great book about educational moving pictures of which I write is issued by Mr. George Kleine, of 52 State street, Chicago, and 19 East Twenty-first street, New York City. It has a pretty cover, a graceful dedication to Mr. Edison and some introductory notes on education by moving pictures. Moreover, the little paper by Professor F. K. Starr, entitled "The World Before Your Eyes," which was reproduced in these pages last year, is also printed. Mr. Edison himself also sends Mr. Kleine a letter appreciative of this very fine catalogue.

I have called it a catalogue and it calls itself a catalogue. I have handled and written hundreds of trade catalogues in my time, but I have never handled one with such pleasure as I am doing this one. I decline to regard it as a catalogue. It is a book full of fascination, and its reading matter, to anybody who takes the smallest interest in the subject, must be, I am quite sure, as absorbing as any book of fiction, travel or science that could be chosen and read at random.

* * *

I hope the reader who profits every week by this little sermon on the screen will be as much impressed by the magnificence of this interesting moving picture book as I am. I do not think there could be any finer monument to Kleine's business enterprise and acumen than this book, of which I would like to see a copy in every educational institution in the United States: Every university, every college, every school, every church, every chapel. Because I think that if it were brought to the notice of those responsible for the education and religious life of the people of this country it would give the moving picture such an uplift that it is hard to conceive how valuable its uses in educational work would be. I think Mr. Kleine deserves the thanks of the entire moving picture public for issuing this book.

* * *

The book to me has other uses. I would like, if I had the time, money and opportunity, to keep a parcel of this valuable book by me so that when people of the Dr. Anna Shaw, Judge O'Sullivan, Representative Mellen type, and other stupid fanatics who attack the moving picture,—I say that when people of this foolish type air their venomous ignorance about the picture, either in public or private, they could be presented with a copy of Kleine's book, in order that they might learn what the moving picture is in one of its best aspects. The book, besides dealing with educational moving pictures, is an education in itself. I have learned a huge lot from it and hope to learn a huge lot more. It tells me that subjects have been made by the moving picture that I did not think or dream of had been been treated that way. So that, aside of the newspaper view of merely writing about this book, I feel personally obliged to Mr. Kleine for letting me make so valuable an addition to my knowledge about the picture. "G. K." I take off my hat to you!

The value of the book will be increased as time goes on, for I gather from one of the prefatory articles, that forthcoming supplements will be issued, and that no purely educational films exist outside of those listed in the book. Moreover, that ten years have been devoted to collecting the pictures. This shows what a great amount of work has been done and it also shows what a vast scope there is before the book, now, and in the future, as the standard reference library of moving pictures. I can easily see how this catalogue—I beg pardon, book—bids fair to become the standard world's reference of the subject. I can fancy a man, say, in Lower California, wanting to know something about industrial India. Kleine tells him by means of his moving pictures. Or another man wanting to know something about cutting oak and removing tan bark; or another man wanting to know something about Sicilian industries; and yet a fourth desiring to learn something about the wicker chair industry of Maderia. I opened the Kleine book at random, at pages 168 and 169, and there are the subjects treated on those pages. I have no hesitation in calling this book the most valuable publication ever issued in connection with moving picture photography.

A catalogue that will interest moving picture exhibitors and one that will prove a valuable source of information to them, has just been issued by the progressive Novelty Slide Company. This booklet is devoted to the latest illustrated songs, old home songs, modern lecturettes and Novelty Puzzlettes. It is probably the largest and most complete list ever issued of its kind, and contains the names of songs and publishers in alphabetical order. Over 1,000 sets are listed, and exhibitors will find this a handy reference book when arranging their illustrated song or lecture program. Every set listed is carried in stock and can be rented. A special feature of the catalogue that will appeal to many managers is the list of popular old home songs. The old standard melodies are being constantly requested by moving picture patrons and quite a number of picture houses are using the same with satisfactory results. Lecturettes are now in use in many of the largest houses, and a large selection is available covering travels in every country of the world, as well as on other subjects. Novelty Puzzlettes are gaining favor every day, and reports from all over the United States and Canada indicate that this novel attraction is pleasing, puzzling and attracting patrons and incidentally increasing receipts. The complete catalogue is mailed free of charge to all inquiring for same to the Novelty Slide Company, 221 East Fifty-third street, New York City.

THE LOBBY READING ROOM.

By H. F. Hoffman.

It is easy to sit down and write suggestions to managers, but the principal drawback to most suggestions is that it usually costs a lot of money to carry them out. As a manager I have been tipped off to a lot of good ways to please my patrons, but when it came right down to doing them I always found that any one of them would put a crimp in my bank roll and I generally passed them up when I had figured the cost.

I like to make suggestions that don't cost money, and I want to tell you of a little idea that helped to make my place quite popular for very little money. I turned my lobby into a library. A library of fun and a library without books. Before doing so, my entrance was often crowded with people waiting for the next show. They were obliged to stand like sheep in a pen with nothing to interest them. I had discarded the noisy phonograph early in the game, because I believed it cheapens a house and many managers will agree with me in this, I know.

Having no phonograph, there was nothing to break the monotony of standing and waiting, and I often wondered how people could be show-hungry enough to do it night after night. For my part, I would have turned back home and I dare say there were many who did.

At any rate, I had occasion, one night, to post a special notice and the way the patrons flocked around it was enough to convince me that they wanted something to amuse them while waiting for the big show. The next day I posted some clippings from a funny paper and they were read with the same interest, but there were not enough of them; the jokes were read in a few minutes and for the lack of any more they were read again, so I began at once to fill my lobby full of them.

At first I thought I had to have a special frame for each story or picture and my bill at the picture framer's was considerable, but I soon found a better way in making enough large frames to go around the foyer. These frames were regular cardboard size, or 22 x 28, and on one sheet of colored cardboard I would group as many short stories and illustrated jokes as was possible without crowding. After they were pasted on I would take a brush and some white varnish and outline them, putting in a scroll here and there, which set them off nicely, as the varnish simply darkens the color of the cardboard to a deeper shade and dries instantly.

These frames were hung about 4½ feet from the floor to the bottom of the frame, or the proper height for reading while standing. Above these frames I hung the larger portraits and prints that could be seen from a greater distance. These I did not frame, but mounted them on suitable cardboard which served the purpose just as well.

I never saw many people turn away after that. They were anxious to get in and see what new stuff I had put up for them. Some called it the "curiosity shop" and others dubbed it their "reading room," but whatever they chose to call it, they knew they could enjoy every minute of the time they were at my place, whether they had to wait or not.

I kept these cardboards working in relays. That is to say: I always had a change in preparation and as soon as it was ready I would remove from its frame the one that had been on view the longest and put in the new one, using the back side of the old one for more jokes.

My collection was at first confined to illustrated jokes and very short stories, but the field began to widen so as to include all manner of items that could possibly be of interest to anybody. I even went so far as to try drawing some cartoons, but I soon found that the moving picture business leaves a man time for little else. Now that I am doing them for The World, however, I hope you will occasionally find one of them that could be displayed in public for the benefit of the good cause.

Good articles concerning moving pictures always got a place of honor in my library. Besides these were editorials from the daily papers, fashion plates for the ladies, anything about the care of babies or children, household hints, etc. Sporting news for the men, boxing, baseball, politics, cartoons, etc. Frivolous items for frivolous people, serious clippings for serious folks, all culled from the daily or Sunday papers. Sometimes a whole page or two from Collier's, Leslie's or other weeklies, begged from the barber, showing wrecks, mine disasters, men of the hour, etc., and all these mixed in with a good supply of jokes, clever post cards, mottoes, popular actors and actresses, etc., etc.

I had so much of it that it would take a week to read it in the patron's way, a few minutes at each time, and, therefore, any cardboard was good for a week or more. My collection came from many sources, once I had it started. Friends and patrons would hand clippings to me as they passed in and many came in the mail. I rifled cafes and barber shops, where I was known, of their weeklies when a new one was due. On the cars I tore out matter and kept it in my hat with a whalebone spring. One time, in a second-hand book store, I picked up a coupel of years' issue of "Life," about five years old, for fifty cents. The jokes in them were so old they were new again, and after that I spent more time around book stalls buying old comic weeklies, prints, etc.

On Sundays, in a couple of hours, I could clip material enough to last a week. I educated my cashier to arrange them on the cardboards during the dull hours of the day, so there wasn't much time lost. The most provoking part of it all was when something I liked was printed on both sides of the same paper. In that case, if the article was strong enough, I would try and get another copy, otherwise I would let it go and use something else. You can go to a lot of expense if you get the craze, but it doesn't pay to go to extremes, because the life of a clipping is short, no matter how good, so take what fits and let the rest go.

With regard to moving picture articles, however, they should be used freely—very freely. I am sure the editor of The World would have no objections to sending you all an extra copy each week where an article backs up on the same sheet, provided you send him an extra $2 for the year's supply. If you do that (it just came into my head this minute) what an awful rake-off there would be coming to me. I'll have to get some advice from my lawyer about how much is due a man in commissions for doubling the circulation of a paper.

QUALITY VS. QUANTITY.

As Viewed by an Exchange Proprietor.

Will the Quality win?
Will the Quantity win?

Not long ago, the cry for good pictures was universal. The average productions were so inferior, that the moving pictures remained the cheap amusement of the common people and no cinematographic theater could find a foothold in the better districts.

When the manufacturers found that there was no money in bad productions, that cultured classes shunned the moving picture shows, that the ministers were fighting them to the bitter end, that the municipal authorities all over the land were raising the licenses, were enacting prohibitive ordinances, etc., the manufacturers came to their senses and started to produce better work, to prove that motion pictures were moral, amusing and instructive.

We had a right to hope for a complete reform, but overproduction steps in and still handicaps Quality. If we could spare the time, we would go over the most recent releases, to mention some of the absurdities being exhibited. What are producers thinking of when they show you a merry widow in the make-up of an old maid? A tall, slender woman, with a sharp nose, hard features, long side curls and manners of the typical old maid, is certainly not the proper person to act the part of a merry widow.

"Capital vs. Labor" is a film that shows a drop on the part of a licensed manufacturer, as it is not the story of an American strike, but an anarchistic revolution, with no moral lesson to it. A minister of the Gospel should and would not have approved such scenes of vandalism by forcing the manufacturer to consent to the terms of the mob. We do not deny the rights of the working classes, but when they destroy homes and are ready to kill they are no more law-abiding citizens, but brigands deserving no sympathy and no moral support from a minister of the Gospel. The minister should have used his influence to pacify the men, reprimand them for their acts, and should have tried to bring a settlement between the strikers and the manufacturer.

But we have some conscientious manufacturers, who are doing their utmost to elevate motion pictures to a better standard, to make them the great educator of the future. Mr. Gaumont has made a name for quality. If he offers us simple stories, he knows how to make master productions out of them; with him it is not a question of quantity, it is a question of quality.

Gaumont's "Fall of Babylon" has already been described and will be a revelation, as we feel confident that the exhibitors who respect their patrons will not show scenes of violence when they know that other master productions are at their disposal.

"The Penitent of Florence" will add more laurels to Gaumont, and "Judith" will surely crown his success.

"Judith" is a film of quality, not of quantity. It is the finest production ever shown on a screen, and I can safely say that no one can recall a picture so true and correct in details, so rich in settings and costumes, so beautiful in colors, so fine in photography and so cleverly produced and acted. "Judith" is certainly a revelation of what cinematography has in store for us. It is impossible to give a description of this coming film, as the pen cannot convey to the mind the impressions left after viewing the picture on the screen. The very few persons present at the advance exhibition were spellbound with admiration and all that they could say would be an exclamation of "Admirable!"

"Judith" can conciliate motion pictures with the better cultured classes, with the ministers and the different authorities, provided that the men who are looking at the dollars they can make to-day, without any consideration for the future of cinematography, do not kill motion pictures by making films by the mile. When they want to turn out so many miles per week, they have no time to select the scenarios, to study them, to prepare the details; no time to do the right thing.

When we will call the attention of the public to "Judith," the ministers and authorities will say: "Yes, 'Judith' is a beautiful and instructive picture, but we cannot whitewash the motion pictures by showing a few isolated examples that stand for quality.

T. RUTH.

COMMENTS OF THE FLEETING HOUR.

By W. Stephen Bush.

It is with the utmost diffidence, but in an eager spirit of helpfulness, that I venture the suggestion to certain film makers not to revel too much in the gruesome and the ghastly. I have the sincerest admiration for the Edison and Vitagraph studios, but it must be said, with all due deference to these distinguished producers, that such films as "Frankenstein" and "The Mystery of Temple Court," while delightful literature to coroners, undertakers, grave-diggers and morgue-keepers, fail to please the general public. "Fail to please" is putting it mildly. Anyone who has read Mrs. Shelley's preface will realize at once that she would have recoiled with disgust from the thought of putting the thing into moving pictures, had moving pictures been known in her day. "The Mystery of Temple Court," a genuine Laura Jean Libby title, brings us into a hidden chamber, where the body of a dead woman has been undergoing the process of decomposition. The realism, which attempts to portray the sense of smell in a drama, is almost always misplaced and bound to result in something unpleasing, to say the least. I find nothing loathsome or ghastly, like the rotting of a dead body or the going about of an ill-shaped, silly nightmare, in either the Greek, the English, the French, or the German drama. "Caliban" is a monster of a very different cast, and he is Shakespeare's only monster. Death scenes and executions are interesting historical reading, when well described, but a portrayal of these things on a living screen may well be dispensed with.

In refreshing contrast to the yellow tints of journalism, one of the leading dailies of Philadelphia, "The Evening Telegraph," finds the moving picture not only a wholesome and legitimate form of entertainment, but has enlisted it as a valuable ally in extending its circulation and its sphere of public usefulness. The paper gives a high-class moving picture program free for the benefit of any public institution, such as fire companies, libraries, literary associations, churches, etc. The news of this enterprise has spread and the paper is now besieged with applications for its entertainment from every part of the territory generally reached by the Philadelphia press. The managers of the circulation department, who hit upon this scheme, report splendid results in increasing both the circulation and the prestige of the paper. What constitutes the special significance of this fact for the lovers of the moving picture lies in the circumstance that the paper occupies a very high status in the community and is inclined to be conservative. Through the enterprise of the paper, thousands who were either indifferent or hostile to the moving picture and who would never have gone to an ordinary moving picture show, have forgotten their indifference or prejudice and have been converted into admirers of the moving picture and have become believers in its vast possibilities. For this reason the enterprise seems to deserve a word of praise in these columns.

If the future historian, whose duty it shall be to describe the manners, customs and ways of living of the plain American people, has about six well-selected Selig films, his task will be an easy one. No need of excavating the suburbs of Chicago or digging into the ruins of Indianapolis or Omaha or Des Moines. The Selig films do far more than merely tell a story. They portray with a thousand subtle touches of a master hand the manner of life of the great yeomanry of our country, the plain people, especially of the Middle West. What would be the value of a reel of film showing a story of the time of Pericles or Augustus, faithfully portraying the life in ancient Athens or Rome? The value of the moving picture in this regard, well known to us of the moving picture field, is as yet hidden from the "high brows" of daily journalism.

I believe I could tell, in nine cases out of ten, whether a Selig film is being shown, with my eyes shut, if I could be present among the audience. Audiences always take these films seriously. Their interest is aroused in an unusual degree. The film compels such strict attention that it is impossible for the audience to waste any time in whispered comments. The result is an unusually profound silence.

PLETHORA OF PICTURE DRAMAS FROM PUERILE DRAMATISTS.

"It is in the dramatic productions that we find the lowest ebb of both mind and matter. The situation in this department may be described as exuberantly idiotic. Were it not for an occasionally intelligent dog, some automobiles, and pictures of scenery and places, there would be absolutely 'nothing doing' within the whole compass of the big bull's eye of illumination. Some of these 'little dramas' are so bad that even the machine refuses to go on with the theme and runs off the track. The necessity of watching their subjects closely has driven some of the superior-minded operators crazy. These dramatic productions leave nothing whatever to suggestion or to the imagination. There is no speculation in the treatment, all is of a pat and palpable obviousness that defies the power of penetration by paralyzing it. Thinking, on the part of the audience, is not necessary, in fact it is prohibited. If not your normal condition you must assume a vacuous condition of mind and let your eyes fall lightly upon the cheese cloth. Then they turn on the light and start the reel unwinding, when suddenly we are transported through airy regions of high romance to a Bowery stage. The scenery is grand. The villain rushes down the mountain side and shoots a revolver three times at some one in the cast who most probably deserves the sudden death that has come to him. Exit the villain. Several men, including some honest cowboys, now rush on the scene flourishing vengeance and revolvers. They leave and the heroine appears wringing her hands. She takes a picture from her bosom and kisses it, once, twice, and yet once again. The audience is now seen to weep. Scene 2d, opens up the interior of a humble home of honest poverty; poverty, poverty all around and not a thing to eat! On a cot in the corner a lusty child is dying of starvation. The heroine goes to the cupboard—there is nothing there! She shows the empty bread box whereby the audience knows that she is not telling a lie. The child on the cot seems to murmur 'ain't it hell to be poor.' The hard-hearted old landlord now enters for his rent, there is no rent in that house and the heroine falls on her knees and implores him to let her starve in peace with her sick child. This the old wretch refuses to do and right then, on the instant, forces the distressed woman out into the bitter cold of a Labrador Winter. She gathers her dying child in her arms and goes forth—God knows where! The next scene discovers a fifteen dollar a week elderly millionaire seated in the luxurious parlors of his Fifth avenue mansion. He is gazing steadily on vacant space, thinking deeply. Suddenly there comes a tapping as of some one gently rapping on his chamber door. He rises and opens the door. The heroine and her child fall prostrate at his feet. He raises them up, looks into the face of the strange woman and discovers in her his long lost daughter, who married the villain, who shot the man, up in the mountains. He then produces a newspaper which tells her that her husband was lynched, which makes her a widow. At this instant her rejected lover of former days enters and holds out his arms to her. She drops into her former lover's arms. The old father is now touched beyond expression and amidst the sobs of the audience is led by the starving child to where the happy couple stand expectant. He gives them his blessing with eyes upturned to heaven, when, presto! we're off without a moment's intermission to another subject of equal pathos and sublimity.

"No gentle reader, this is not a sight draft upon your credulity, it is an accurate description of a recent film which we done seen with our own eyes!"—The "Galaxy."

"The Twisted Trail" (Biograph).—A romantic drama, depicting the love difficulties of the foreman of a California ranch who falls in love with the owner's daughter. In a fit of passion the ranchman dies and the foreman is accused of his murder. During his attempt to escape he rescues the girl he loves from a band of Indians and, in conducting her to safety, is captured and narrowly escapes hanging. But, eventually the difficulties are all overcome and the young couple are made happy. Acted with the vigor and the sympathetic understanding which characterizes the work of this company, the picture makes a big hit with the audience.

"Two Gentlemen of the Road" (Lubin).—A funny skit representing two tramps misled by a fake note of some boys who are playing at dime novel stories, and set out to discover the hiding place of the loot described. They get into a physical culture school, where, amid, the Delsarte movements of the girl devotees, all sorts of troubles beset them and they are finally carried away to prison. There is a vein of delicate humor running through the story which adds to its interest and keeps the audience wondering what the next scene will bring forth.

"Wonderful Wizard of Oz" (Selig).—The reproduction of a story of this character in motion pictures is an achievement of sufficient importance to attract more than the usual degree of interest. That it has been successfully accomplished needs scarcely to be said. The reputation of this house for producing striking and unusual films is too well established to require further description. It is an excellent film, well acted and clearly photographed.

"The Suit Case Mystery" (Edison).—A romance which begins with an accident and ends with a wedding, though at first no indication of a wedding appears. The transference of two suit cases alike, one filled with money and the other containing an unfortunate draughtsman's tools, is made the basis of an interesting sequence of events, ending in a wedding. Perhaps the most dramatic scene is where the draughtsman is deciding whether he will keep the money or return it. When he does return it all the other interesting and quite natural results follow in quick succession. Such stories, well worked out, make good pictures and never fail to excite interest and maintain it throughout.

"The Railway Mail Clerk" (Kalem).—A melodrama which will catch the public fancy wherever it is shown. Here is reproduced the thrilling scene of entering a mail car by means of a window and a rope while the train is in motion. To it is added some clever detective work on the part of the wife of the mail clerk who was accused of the robbery. It is a thriller of the most pronounced type, emphasized by the fact that it is a railroad picture and, therefore, makes an even stronger appeal that it otherwise would. The Kalem Company reproduce these pictures in a masterly way and their work never fails to please. Steady advance in the character and literary quality of the pictures and the work of the photographer have combined to make a picture that will hold the attention of any audience as long as it runs. Our one regret is that dramas of this class necessitate showing burglary or villainy as an anti-climax to the moral. But such stories appeal to a large number.

"No Trifling with Love" (Pathe).—A strongly dramatic representation of the results of a man's duplicity when he makes love to one girl for the purpose of arousing jealousy in another and thereby shaking her purpose to enter a convent. The acting is sympathetic, and one's nerves become tense under the strains of the acting of Rosette as she rushes toward the lake and throws herself in. And there is another dramatic scene when her body is discovered and vain attempts are made to resuscitate her. The picture is a tragedy, depicting clearly the terrible results of trifling with such a serious matter as an affair of the heart.

"The Banks of the Ganges" (Pathe).—A clearly photographed picture of the attractive and, to Western eyes, novel sights along the banks of the sacred river of India. Detailed description is unnecessary; suffice it to say that the Pathe reputation for excellence in travel pictures in no wise suffers in this one. It brings to the doors of thousands who could never see it a realistic reproduction of the banks of this interesting river, interesting because of its religious significance to millions of people.

"The Hand of Fate" (Vitagraph).—A strongly dramatic picture reproducing a series of events from the shooting and robbing of a miner, almost to the wedding of the children of the two principal actors in the first scene of the drama, years before. The novelty lies in the two men talking it over and agreeing to remain silent. The closing scene, where the erstwhile highwayman, banished by the consequence of his own act years before, is seen riding away alone over a desolate plain, is pathetic, yet its stern justice must be admitted. Some of the best work of the Vitagraph actors has been lavished upon this picture and the result is a satisfactory and altogether pleasing film. The hand of fate in working out the problems of human destiny is clearly depicted.

"Gold Is Not All" (Biograph).—Such pictures should assist in creating a sentiment that will place a true value upon wealth in its relation to human happiness and its influence upon life. The story is told in the strong contrast of the lives of two girls, one married to a man of wealth, the other to a poor young man. The world will say instantly that the one with the money is happy. Ten years later the scene changes and the wealthy girl, deserted by her husband, weeps alone over the deathbed of her child. The poor girl, surrounded by her children and loving husband, shows every indication of happiness. No further explanation is necessary. It is enough, perhaps, to say this much. One's imagination can supply the rest. Sympathetically acted and admirably photographed, this picture deserves the higest commendation.

"Spanish Wife" (Lubin).—A strongly dramatic picture, which is acted with all the sympathy and energy usually displayed by those players. The Lubin dramas of this type have always been successful because of the satisfactory treatment of the subjects. The strength and unity of the pieces selected for illustration, and the sympathetic interpretation of the players have combined to produce pictures which have pleased and satisfied the thousands who have seen them. In this instance the best traditions of the house have been lived up to and the result is in every way satisfactory.

"The Little Vixen" (Pathe).—A little skit which centers around the childish attempt of a vixen of a girl constantly eluding a lover who wants to marry her. At last he plays a trick on her sufficiently original to suit the most exacting flirt. Perhaps he won her and was well satisfied with his bargain. Perhaps she really cared for him after all.

"Polar Bear Hunt" (Pathe).—Making motion pictures in a region of perpetual ice must be beset with numerous difficulties. Yet this one brings to audiences far removed from the ice-locked scene all the grandeur and isolation of the Polar world. The hunt adds a zest to the scene, but probably the main interest will center in the reproduction of characteristic scenery and the interpretation of the mystery of silence which will be the result of seeing the picture. It is scenic and unquestionably educational in its influence.

"The Treasure Hunters" (Selig).—A thrilling story of adventure in the South Sea islands, reproduced with the care and attention to detail which have made this sort of pictures from Selig popular. There are many details which clearly represent life in that far away region, and the development of the story is made so natural that interest never flags. Well acted and clearly photographed, the picture will not fail to interest an audience anywhere.

"His Hunting Trip" (Essanay).—Here is a comedy with all the life and snap and go that characterize the comedies issued by this house. It portrays the uproariously funny adventures of a gentleman upon a hunting trip, and like all the comedies from this studio it has made a big hit. It is unnecessary to tell the story. Better see it and learn for one's self. It is unnecessary, too, to undertake detailed criticism. The film was intended to be funny and it succeeds admirably in its purpose. What more could the most exacting and destructive critic desire?

"Red Hawk's Last Raid" (Kalem).—A certain type of Indian character is graphically depicted in this picture, which purports to show how a young brave makes a foray against the whites to win fame and the hand of the chief's daughter. But his hopes are doomed to disappointment and he succeeds only in winning an ignominious death at the hands of his white enemies. The delineation of Indian character and accessories seems to be accurate. It should be, since real Indians act the play. It is well done. Anyone will agree to that, and the photography is quite up to the standard.

"Lo, the Poor Indian" (Kalem).—An entirely different type of Indian story. A young brave steals a horse to save his squaw and pappoose from starving. But he is caught and put in jail, a victim of laws which he does not comprehend. This picture should set one thinking. It should arouse a sense of the injustice which has been meted out to unfortunate Indians on the supposed intention of following the white man's ideas of justice. The two will always conflict, no matter how earnest the effort to reconcile them, and because they do conflict they will always work injustice to the weaker party. Perhaps the comprehension of this fact will be forced by a wide exhibition of such pictures as this.

"Out of Sight, Out of Mind" (Pathe).—A bit of a love story, showing how soon one may forget a lover, holding some interest, though of no particular importance as a story. But the scenic qualities are out of the ordinary. Most of the scenes were made outdoors, and the coloring of this portion of the film is of rare beauty, adding materially to the attractiveness of the entire picture. The story does not help it particularly, but the heart interest which it contains does not detract from the beauty of the film.

"Driven to Steal" (Pathe).—A rather gloomy subject, yet perhaps containing some elements of usefulness in that it may arouse here and there a person to a comprehension of the misery which surrounds them. Few ever stop to think that sometimes men are driven to crime by the suffering of their families. This picture graphically describes such an instance and develops the story in a quite natural way, ending with the man at work and his family well and happy.

"The Midnight Escape" (Urban).—A drama excellently acted and clearly photographed, developing the story easily. In places the acting rises to the more than ordinary heights of histrionic effort. The finished work of the Urban company would make a commonplace drama interesting.

"Making Sherry Wine at Xeres" (Urban).—An industrial picture representing the making of sherry wine in the district of Xeres, Spain, noted for its sherries. All the details of the industry are shown, from the preparation of the fruit to the sale of the wine. The photography is admirable, as might be expected from this house, and one can acquire an accurate knowledge of the making of this favorite wine. It is a good addition to the series of excellent industrial films.

"The Indiscretions of Betty" (Vitagraph).—A graphically told story of the indiscretions of a young woman who has social aspirations beyond her means. It is a common story, too common for comfort, perhaps, and it is told in such a dramatic way that it becomes more than ordinarily impressive. The dramatic climax, where the Count forces his attentions upon her and is soundly chastised by the husband, makes a fitting close to the film. There are numerous lessons in this picture, nor is there any attempt to conceal them. Perhaps they will exert a beneficial influence upon other women who may be falling into the same kind of temptation.

"Diary of a Nurse" (Gaumont).—A dramatic film of interest, acted with sympathy and photographed with intelligence. There is a good story in it, one that will be seen with interest by the large numbers in the motion picture audiences throughout the country.

"Bradford's Claim" (Edison).—Perhaps the most interesting portion of this film is the work of Don Fulano, the educated horse. While the drama in the story is good and well acted, the interest which centers around this horse will probably surpass that of the rest of the picture. It is photographed with the skill which usually goes with the Edison pictures, and in a film of this type that helps greatly.

"The Capture of the Burglar" (Edison).—A bit of comedy, the fun in which is based upon some absurd situations and combinations. There is a snap and dash to the acting which makes the picture realistic and contributes to the picture's success.

INDEPENDENT FILMS

"An Unworthy Fiance" (Ambrosio).—Why this film was made might be difficult to understand. One might expect sensations and gloom in a yellow newspaper, but why an audience should be asked to see an approaching wedding turned to grief by depicting the thievery of the prospective groom does not appear. No good is served and no information is conveyed, hence, why waste film in reproducing such pictures?

"A Sudden Telephone Call" (Ambrosio).—A curiosity not without interest, in that it represents two barrels in which policemen have been securely nailed careering madly through the streets, until they arrive at the police station, where the prisoners are released by their comrades.

"The Cowboy Preacher" (Nestor).—A lively story, which contains something of the characteristic features of the West, and at the same time develops an interesting, though somewhat complicated plot. A girl and a mortage, with a wedding to raise it; a curious elopement, which ends in an almost immediate return to the house, and this time a wedding, by an original individual of a cowboy preacher, with everybody forgiven and the mortgage lifted as a finale. Here is life enough and variety enough and movement enough to keep any audience interested. In some instances the comedy is extremely funny; for example, where the preacher puts off his clerical garb and hides his Bible before he will take a drink, and puts it on again to perform the ceremony. The acting is quite in harmony with the subject.

"A Drama on the Reef" (Lux).—A tragedy of the sea, which ends happily. An attraction of this picture is the reproduction of the sea. Some of the scenes are beautiful and some seem to convey an impression of the sea which is accurate and convincing. The picture will please because of this, and the story which adds heart interest will scarcely be overlooked.

"Cured by a Tip" (Lux).—A lively comedy, which introduces some new ideas and is worked out with care and attention to details. The life exhibited is sufficiently interesting to hold the attention continuously.

"She's Done It Again" (Thanhouser).—A comedy from this house which introduces some novel elements. A jewel robbery was proved upon the confession of the principal to be a fake. Then a burglar gets to work and decides to have the next one real, and upon his success in this is based the story. Of course the public assumes that the second story is quite as fishy as the first, and not until a clever detective turns up and proves that a real robbery occurred will they believe it. The acting is sympathetic—one almost wants to say vigorous, and the photographer has performed his part satisfactorily. The combination of these elements has contributed to the success of the picture. Perhaps this film is no better than previous releases by the same house, but it is a better subject than one, at least, of its previous issues and it is handled to excellent advantage.

"The Stage Note" (Imp).—An amusing picture based upon the acting of an awful amateur drama, and afterward the reproduction of one of its scenes in real life. At times one scarcely knows whether to take it as an amusing film, or whether it is intended to be serious. When the messenger boy is liberally rewarded with kisses by the rescued girl one is disposed to call it funny. It is well acted and the photography is clear and quite in keeping with the subject.

"Stunts on Skates by Edward Lamy" (Imp).—An excellent exhibition of fancy skating by a master of the graceful and attractive art. The photography is remarkably good considering the rapid movement in some instances.

"Trip to Berne" (Eclair).—A picture which will long haunt the memory because it gives an accurate view of a trip to this picturesque and popular Swiss resort and at the same time conveys the impression of strength and grandeur which should characterize a picture of this sort. The photography is excellent and in most instances the points of view were chosen with due regard to making a favorable impression upon those who see the picture. More and more travel and scenic pictures are improving. The attention to the selection of point of view, the tonal qualities of the resulting print and the manifest endeavor to reproduce the tonal gradations as well as the pictorial elements of the original scene all combine to make scenes which not only give an accurate impression of the scene itself, but conform to accepted principles of art. Such pictures are satisfactory, and this Eclair film is worthy to be included in the list of travel pictures which have been successfully produced recently.

"The Man Who Waited" (Powers Company).—A rendition of the old story of the country girl attracted from her lover by the superior attractions of a city man. A wedding, which is void because a divorce had not been granted, adds zest to the picture. Then there is the long wait by the original lover, and somewhat startling denouement when the deceived girl's daughter brings her mother and her original lover together. One hargly knows how to class this subject. It tells a common story in an interesting way, but one has a feeling that the details of the story are scarcely worked out in a pleasing way. The suggestion offered at the closing is not wholly pleasant. Sometimes a series of mixed impressions follow a picture of this kind and it is not easy to say just which is the stronger, the pleasant or the unpleasant. The picture has a genuine heart interest, however, and that saves it.

"Company D to the Rescue" (Bison).—A thrilling Western melodrama, with Indians, cowboys, a company of United States soldiers, a held up stage coach, a stolen girl, several deaths and wounds, a dashing rescue and a band of Indians sent into eternity, all in 1,000 feet of film, and all acted with a whirlwind dash that almost stops one's breath. What more could be asked in one film by any exhibitor?

"Transfusion" (Imp).—A love story based upon an operation now becoming common in surgery, but never before utilized in motion pictures. A young blacksmith gives of his blood to save a young girl's life and she, in turn, gives him her love. It is a simple story, yet it is so sympathetically acted by the Imp players that one feels the impulses which actuated both the men, and applause for the blacksmith and the equally sensible and honest girl seems only natural. It is a good picture and can hardly fail to stir the emotions.

ESSANAY IN COLORADO.

With the advent of Spring and balmy weather, G. M. Anderson and his stock company, who have been Wintering in sunny Santa Barbara, Cal., have packed their tents and have slipped quietly back to Colorado. They arrived in Denver last Monday and are located on a ranch some distance out of the city.

Mr. Anderson, in an interview on his arrival in Denver, declared that he had some big stuff in mind and needed a little Colorado local color.

"Santa Barbara has proven the ideal Winter resort of the moving picture man," Mr. Anderson said, "as I believe our Western pictures have proven. Although the last two weeks of our stay in the coast town have been hampered by rather unpleasant weather, something unusual for Santa Barbara, the best part of the season has been ideal, with little rain and a great amount of sunshine. However, I am glad to get back to Colorado and expect to put over some big stuff while I am here."

Mr. Anderson carries with him an excellent stock company with scenic artists, property and camera men. The movable studio has proven itself indispensable and a great aid to them in their work. Mr. Anderson stated that his stay in Colorado would be indefinite.

The Essanay's big patriotic picture, "The Hand of Uncle Sam," has received much well deserved applause from exhibitors and exchanges all over the country. At the Orpheum Theater, Chicago, where the writer viewed it, it was received with hand clapping almost uninterruptedly all through the picture. Manager W. J. West, of the Majestic Theater, Kewanee, Ill., wrote to his exchange: "It is the first film I have shown in six months which received constant applause. It certainly made an impression with my audiences."

LUBIN ACTIVITIES.

One of the Easter attractions at Atlantic City was the making of a motion picture on the board walk and beach. This was not an "Easter Parade at Atlantic City," but a ripping little comedy that will soon be found among the announced releases and form a fit successor to "A Hot Time at Atlantic City." And, by the way, orders for new prints of the "Hot Time" are still coming in, though the release date is more than six months away.

Trick pictures are rare indeed in these days of the Indian tale and Western stories, but one of the Lubin experts is at work on a subject that will gladden the hearts of the children and their elders as well.

The Lubin scenario department is still laughing over a letter received the other day, in which the writer gave the briefest outline of an Indian play and wound up by offering to come over and play the leading role, adding the information that he was fourteen years of age, but tall. Up to date he has not been sent for.

Three strong comedies on a single reel is the Lubin announcement for April 11. The double comedy reel is a novelty, but three good humorous subjects that combined measure a flat 900 feet means a lot of concentration. April 4 marks the release day of a double reel including "Back to Boarding," an unusually funny comedy.

Two stories in which children are effectively employed figure in Lubin releases in the immediate future. Most children are either stupid or self-conscious before the camera, and the Lubin directors are fortunate in having at command a dozen children of varying ages, all of whom are unusually clever. One ten-year-old is an artist in make-up and spends his leisure time in the studio sketching makes-up of various types, which later he reproduces in pigments on his own small countenance. The older players humor him in the matter of grease paint, letting him raid their make-up boxes and helping him with suggestions, and he is developing remarkable skill.

In Lubin's new projecting machine we notice some meritorious improvements which will interest prospective purchasers. The first improvement is the rewinder which is a new departure. The old rewinding belt is replaced by a rod and spiral gears, which by a positive movement winds the film absolutely perfect. The rewinder does not pull the film from the mechanism nor does it allow the film to slack in the fire box.

By placing the shutter before the lens, Mr. Lubin claims that the flicker is greatly reduced, which is generally caused by a shutter inside the mechanism. Aside from this, an inside shutter cannot be regulated, while an outside shutter can be adjusted to any focus lens and to any distance of the machine from the screen.

As much depends on the exactness of a sprocket wheel, the Lubin sprockets are cut on the shaft. The star and sprocket are both cut on the shaft, thus making an uneven movement absolutely impossible, which is generally caused when the star and sprocket are cut separately and assembled later on.

THE AGFA FLASH LAMP.

Many of our readers, we know, are interested in flashlight photography of the stationary kind, and would be glad to have our reference to this ingenious little piece of apparatus. We have had considerable experience in flashlight photography ourselves, and know the convenience of having at hand a lamp, portable and inexpensive, for the purpose of taking family groups or interiors. It is for these purposes that the Agfa flash lamp is especially suited. The magnesium is ignited by a series of sparks produced by the revolution of a toothed wheel against a metallic surface, so that the ignition is perfect, rapid and complete. The Agfa flash lamp is portable and can be used either in the hand or on the stand, and sells for the moderate sum of $1.75. We would advise our readers to send to the Berlin Aniline Works, of 215 Water street, New York City, for one of these ingenious and handy little photographic instruments.

CHARLES L. FULLER RETURNS TO NEW YORK.

Charles L. Fuller has just returned from a four months' trip through the Middle Western, Southern and far Western States of the country on behalf of a New York film importing company, meeting with very great success, both personally and commercially, doing a large amount of business and making a large number of friends. "Charles," if we may so call him, has only been in the business a few months, but being a man of intelligence and application has mastered its intricacies. There are probably few men in the country who know the business as well as he does, by the light of the valuable experience he has gained. We hope to hear of Mr. Fuller in another and even more important capacity than that which he filled during the past Autumn and Winter and which circumstances over which he had no control have compelled him to vacate. We want more men of the type of Fuller in the business: strenuous, hard-working and with a fixed belief in its successful future.

The California Film Exchange, 1065 Mission street, San Francisco, is a live wire in the Independent field, carrying a full line of supplies for moving picture theaters, and really are buyers of the full line of Independent releases. They are doing a very good business on the Pacific coast and operate a branch office at Los Angeles, in the Alhambra Building.

Mr. E. E. Fulton, of Chicago, Ill., has been appointed the Western representative for the films of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, controlling the territory west and south of Pittsburg. Mr. Fulton is looking for a suitable location in the district of the loop and, when located, he will have more to say on his plans for the future.

Calling upon the Paramount Film Company, of 61 West Fourteenth street, the other day, we were informed that the company had been reorganized. They are now in a position whereby they can furnish the best Independent service. They are buying all of the subjects released by the different Independent manufacturers on their release days.

Their film is in first class condition, and film that the exhibitor will be pleased with, as it will increase his patronage, increase his box office receipts and will also allow him to compete with any other exhibitor in his neighborhood. The Paramount Company have also installed a system which prevents repeaters—a valuable asset for any up-to-date film exchange.

A beautifully hand-painted banner and lithographed poster will be given away free of charge, for a limited period, to any of their customers. These posters are not only attractive, but portray graphically the film they represent.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Shutter Adjustment.—Walton, N. Y., writes as follows: "Pin which holds cog wheel on main shaft of my Power's No. 5 dropped out, consequently the shutter got out of place Fixed the pin and, after a hard tussle, the shutter. The picture is steady but there is a flash of light on upper right hand corner of picture and sometimes in center as well. Also there is a cluster of light just below bottom of picture, on curtain. It is impossible to send machine to factory just now. Can you suggest a remedy?"

I think there is no doubt but that you are getting what we call a "travel ghost," caused by shutter being not set just right. The "cluster of light" puzzles me considerably. Provided it be not a reflection from some house light, I should say the most likely cause would be oil on your projection lens. This will sometimes cause refraction of light, producing such a condition as you describe, though not often. As I understand you, the "cluster of light" is not in the picture itself, but just below it. As to the shutter: First set your frame-up lever in central position. Next remove shutter guard (the semi-circular wing on operating side of machine) and loosen shutter on its spindle by backing off on the two screws in shutter hub. Now turn the flywheel in the direction it runs until intermittent sprocket has just completed its movement and cam-pin is just half way out of start slot Now revolve shutter on its spindle in the direction it runs until it just begins to open the aperture and sets in position as shown in sketch. Tighten the spindle, release guard and your shutter is right. Remember, however, to have frame-up lever in center of its travel and to revolve both flywheel and shutter in the direction they normally run when machine is in motion.

Picture Out of Focus.—Beardstown, Ill., writes: "Have 15-foot picture at 54 feet 6 inches. Using Gundlach lens specially made for us. Edison Exhibition Model machine, two 6½-inch condenser; distance from front condensing lens to projector, 19½ inches; 220-volt alternating through Compensarc. Using Electra Pink Label carbons top and bottom Pulling about 40 amperes. My picture is not sharp all over. In the center it is sharp as anyone could wish, but at both sides it is hazy. Have tried changing combination in projector, but it don't seem to help." In other portions of this exceedingly well written letter (well written in sense of giving full data) Beardstown seems to suspect trouble is due to alternating current, with which he is not very familiar.

Your condensers, carbons, etc., are all right. Distance from lamphouse to film is excessive, but should not produce result described. Trouble may possibly be in lens, but I think not. It appears to me practically certain that trouble lies in your aperture plate or tension springs. Your film "cupping" inward or outward as it passes the aperture. If aperture plate tracks are at all worn put on new ones. Examine carefully and see if tension springs are bearing squarely on aperture plate tracks, either one or both of them setting too far in or out might cup the film and produce results as set forth. If not found thus, take off aperture plate and see if it has not some dirt behind it which has sprung it when the screws were tightened down. Not likely, but possible. Also barely possible that the surface upon which aperture plate rests was not milled true, causing plate to belly out or inward. Your trouble, as I said, is in the aperture plate or tension springs, I am pretty sure.

Worn Gears.—Rivington, N. Y., writes asking questions and requesting immediate answer, presumably by mail. No postage is enclosed. I am glad to help managers and operators, but when they ask me to take time and trouble to answer communications at once, it would seem the least they could do would be to enclose postage for reply. Asking a man to give time and pay even two cents for the privilege of doing it seems to me a trifle unreasonable. Those wanting mail replies must, in future, enclose the sum of one dollar. Answers through The World are free and you are entirely welcome to use this page as much as you like. He writes as follows: "Have Power's No. 5 machine. When I frame down it runs easy, but when I frame up it grinds, makes a lot of noise, and there is a flicker. When I drop some oil in the shutter governor the machine runs easy, but soon runs hard again. Do worn bushings and worn cam-pin have anything to do with flickering? I am sure the shutter is set right."

I think you are running a machine with badly worn gears. Also the toggle joint which holds the left side of frame-up carriage is worn. This causes the grind when you frame up. When you are framed down it holds tight, but is loose when framed up. Machine should be sent to factory for repairs. It is more than likely your fire shutter governor is badly worn also. From what you say I believe the springs inside are weak, producing excessive friction. The weights of the governor are held in by two small, spiral springs Probably they need renewing. No, worn bushings and cam-pin would not make a flicker. They should be renewed, however, as they produce bad results.

Aperture Plate Out of True.—St. Paul, Minn., says the dividing line of his picture does not set square with aperture. He has tried to remedy it by raising one end of star shaft, but pin jams in star when he does that.

You could not remedy such a trouble that way, but would only succeed in ruining your intermittent movement. I think you will find that the screw holes for the screws holding aperture plate have been wrongly drilled and the aperture plate is out of line. You can test this by using a machinist's steel rule. Lay your machine down flat and lay rule on plate so that one edge rests against one side of upper sprocket and other lower sprocket and see if side of aperture lines with them. Also you may remove all screws but one upper one from aperture plate and see if you cannot line it with picture. I think you will find this is what is wrong. You don't say what make of machine it is, but if I am right it is up to them to send you another mechanism to use while you send in that one to be corrected. Cases of this kind (this kind of fault, I mean) have been known to occur.

Cracked Condensor, Etc.—Chicopee Falls, Mass., writes: "Does it make any difference if the back condenser has a straight crack? Which condenser should be placed nearest lamp? What focal length, or back focus condenser lenses, should be used for 11 x 13 picture at 67 feet? Is it better to have a cotton curtain or a heavy duck? We work all effects and have to see picture from back of curtain."

Provided the crack be straight through the glass there will be no appreciable effect on motion picture, but it will show in stereo picture. If you are using condensing lenses of two focal lengths it is best to place the thinner lens next to light, as it does not break quite so readily. The effect is the same whichever way they are used, so far as the projection is concerned. You are using about a 5-inch projection lens and should have two condensing lenses not less than 7½ each, back focus. Eight and a half would be still better. The best cloth curtain I know of is the bleached sheeting of good quality, such as is used for bed sheets. It may be had, I believe, 8 feet in width and should be washed occasionally. Stretch tight on frame. It is very white and you can see picture from back. It is plenty heavy enough. Nothing is gained by using heavy duck and it would be hard to get it white enough. Sheeting of good quality (bleached) makes a splendid curtain.

Renewing Dry Batteries.—Milwaukee, Wis., (Mr. Fred C. Lowe) writes as follows and the thanks of the editor of this column are his for the information sent: "Exhausted dry batteries may be renewed as follows and work very nicely: If the batteries have no soft spots in the zincs punch them full of holes all around within an inch of the top. Be very careful not to punch into the carbon stick and break it. Also be careful not to break the sealing wax around the top. Next, make a solution of one-fourth pound of sal ammoniac to one quart of water and immerse the batteries in it for about one-half hour each. Next take them out and stand upside down for an hour or so, wipe dry and replace in cardboard cases. They will then be ready for use. In standing them upside down care should be taken that none of the solution gets across the elements (connecting the zinc and carbon, I take it Brother Lowe means) for that would act as a short circuit and run the batteries down again right away. Five or six batteries may be renewed this way for a total cost of about five cents.

Auditorium Lights.—Mt. Clemens, Mich., asked last week what color lights might be used in the auditorium while the picture is on, among other questions. I did not answer this query as fully as I should have done. A surprising amount of light may be permitted in the auditorium without material injury to the picture if it is done right. Light green globes do not seem to affect the picture if not placed too close to the screen. Say 20 feet away. White lights may be quite freely used, particularly if they be ground glass globes, or clear ones enclosed in ground glass globes, provided the rays are shaded so as not to strike the curtain. That is the secret of it all. Don't allow the rays from a white light to strike the curtain directly. Care must also be had that white lights be not so placed as to strike directly the eyes of the audience. If the globes be of ground glass the whole problem is considerably simplified, but even then the rays must be shaded from the curtain.

PATHE PROGRESS.

That indefatigable cinematographer, M. Charles Pathe, is increasing his facilities on broad and sensible lines. He trains men under his own eye until they come up to his standard of Pathe quality and then he sends them out into other countries to make good. This places his operatives on their mettle and also ensures local color in the productions. Besides the several studios in France to which we recently alluded, Pathe has studios and stock companies operating in Italy, Spain and Russia. Now we learn that the greatest of them all is to be erected in the United States and building operations will very soon be started.

The new studio will be in charge of Louis J. Gasnier, who has just arrived from Paris, where he assisted Mr. Zecca, the eminent producer, known all over France as one of the highest authorities on proper staging. Mr. Gasnier's ability both as a stage director and photographer, has been very broad, and he is thoroughly equipped to take entire charge of this American picture-producing plant. Mr. Berst, however, will exercise his right of general supervision, and the excellence of the American productions is thus assured. The details of the building of the studio, its location and the cost will be announced later. It is well to note that the actors and actresses engaged for the American stock company will number among their members some of the most well-known and popular actors on the American stage. One-half of the Pathe releases, after the studio opens, will be American subjects and the other half imported.

Mr. Gasnier is a man of great resource, and has had many thrilling adventures in the production of films. One notable instance of this was during the photographing of the almost classic film produced by Pathe Freres some time ago, and known as "The Runaway Horse." This will be remembered as one of the most excellent films ever produced, and much comment was heard as to how it was possible to secure a horse with such intelligence as this one seemed to have. The secret of the matter lay in the fact that underneath the body of the wagon, which was a two-wheeled vehicle, there was attached a coffin with the end knocked out. This was chosen because of its interior padding. In this, Mr. Gasnier took his position, face downward, and dressed entirely in black, with black gloves, and a mask similar to those used in the days of the Inquisition, over his face, and from here he drove the spirited cavalry horse by means of two steel wires on the ends of which were fastened sticks for him to hold in his hands. The shafts of the wagon were fastened to the body by steel bands, but in spite of this arrangement Mr. Gasnier was nearly killed. Just after the scene which shows the wagon knocking down the scaffold, the steel bands broke, and Mr. Gasnier, as the wagon pitched forward and turned a complete somersault, was so badly injured that he was unconscious for more than half an hour and spent fifteen days in the hospital. The horse, at the time of this accident, was really running away, and having rid himself of the cart, dashed ahead, and finally ran into the river. Mr. Gasnier's nerve is shown by the fact that after his release from the hospital he got back into the repaired vehicle and finished the picture. Mr. Pathe subsequently offered a prize of $500 to any man who would duplicate the feat. Needless to say, the offer was never taken up.

THE PARKWAY THEATER.

New York's newest moving picture theater is situated in a district where we are very glad indeed to see such a building. It is round about 110th street and Central Park West, one of the best parts of the city, inhabited by people of wealth and social position—a class very desirable to attract to the picture on every possible occasion. We paid a visit to this new theater the other evening and were agreeably surprised at the high-class character of the patrons. The house is well managed, the attendants courteous, while structurally and in detail the little theater reflects very great credit on those responsible for its erection. We would like Dr. Anna Shaw, Judge O'Sullivan and Representative Mellen to do as we did, and that is, to pay a surprise visit to the Parkway Theater. Then they would see for themselves that a well-conducted moving picture house is as orderly and as decorous as even a church or a chapel, or a suffragette meeting. We would like to see more houses of the Parkway Theater type, especially in the more cultured parts of the city, because it is getting a class of people in touch with the picture whose patronage it is always desirable to have. For example, on the occasion of our visit we saw a number of ladies from the immediate neighborhood, who came in, let it be said, without their hats, after dinner. In fact, the audience of the Parkway had quite a family aspect, which we always like to see in a moving picture theater. We like to hear from exhibitors' own lips that their houses are constantly and regularly patronized by the better class inhabitants of the district.

Carl Theodore Goldenberg, for five and a half years manager of Pathe Freres' New York office, has tendered his resignation. He leaves with the best wishes of both Mr. Pathe and Mr. Berst for his future success. A change also takes place in Pathe's Chicago office. E. H. Montagu tendered his resignation last week and is succeeded by K. W. Linn, from the office at New Orleans. Both of these gentlemen will be greatly missed from their respective offices and we believe we express the hope of all film men that they will not sever their connection with the business.

An advertising novelty that promises to become a fad has been discovered by our Chicago representative. It is a celluloid button bearing a dial and movable hand. The name of the theater will be printed in the center in any desired color. The idea is to present these buttons to the theater patrons and each one will become a walking advertisement. The American Badge Company will supply only one theater in small towns and will not supply two or more theaters in the same neighborhood in the large cities.

The Peerless Motion Picture Company, Kansas City, have secured the contract to serve the new Globe Theater with independent service. The Globe seats 1,200 and is located on Walnut street, in the heart of Kansas City.

The Manhattan Slide Company, Inc., of 136 West 37th street, New York City, under the direction of Frank A. Tichenor as vice-president and manager, wish to announce through the columns of the Moving Picture World that they have entered the field of slide manufacturers to supply the trade with a line of first-class song and announcement slides at popular prices.

The Manhattan Company have secured the entire third floor of the Gotham Attucks Building, and would like to get into communication with all interested exchanges.

Westfield, N. J.—Charles H. Williams, formerly manager of the Standard Theater, 165th street and Amsterdam avenue, Manhattan, and also the Gem Theater, on 154th street, Manhattan, has leased the Casino Theater, at Westfield, N. J., and is giving the town the cleanest form of amusement it has ever had. The Casino is more than a theater, for in the large building there are pool and billiard parlors, bowling alleys, club rooms, lodge rooms, etc. The building stands on a fine residential street, setting well back upon a spacious lawn. It is very beautifully situated and handsome in appearance, more resembling a large country club than a regular theater. Being in a high-toned neighborhood, Mr. Williams' patrons are very select, which encourages him greatly in presenting the cleanest form of entertainment. Mr. Williams has very wisely omitted vaudeville from his bill, knowing full well the shortcomings of what to-day passes current as "vaudeville." Instead of that, four reels are given and two machines are used. There is also a first-class dissolving stereopticon for the illustrated songs. Mr. Williams has discovered a preparation for treating his moving picture canvas that is known only to himself, which is responsible for the extraordinary clearness of the pictures shown at this place. The seating capacity is 500, appointments first-class, and business is remarkably good for Westfield, which has never been rated high as a moving picture town.

There is a renewal of complaint on the part of film exchanges against the lengths of subjects. Last Fall the complaint in this connection was quite general, and by placing it before the various manufacturers direct a change was secured, but it seems that the makers are again drifting into the old habit—taking too long to tell a story. One exchange puts the situation this way: In our opinion, about 850 to 900 feet is ample for a reel. There may be exceptions occasionally, but over that length should not be the rule. In many instances subjects seem to be designedly drawn to reach the 1,000-foot price. We have noticed this quite frequently of late and at times we have been tempted to write the manufacturers and point out the parts of subjects that appeared to us to look much like a clear case of padding; but as a complaint of this nature would in all probability be construed as insolence, if not a direct reflection upon integrity, we have refrained from taking this step, not wishing to incur the enmity of the powers that be. At first thought it would seem that it is to the interest of the manufacturers to make subjects as lengthy as circumstances will permit, but careful reflection has shown us that such is not the case. Our humble opinion is that shorter subjects would enable the manufacturers to dispose of more of their goods. The exhibitors would not object. They are not seeking lengths, but quality. If that feature is looked after, we firmly believe that few of them would object if the subjects did not run over 800 feet, which would enable them to get a short scenic film on the same reel. The bill for a 950 to 1,000 foot film runs into money and it takes expert figuring for an exchange to fix a schedule by which the cost of a film can be secured in the course of fourteen or sixteen days. We know of several exchanges on the licensed side of the field that are unable to maintain a continuous order with the manufacturers for this very reason. A representative of one of them stated recently that if subjects would be made shorter so as to reduce the cost to him he would take every subject a certain concern made, because there was a demand for them in his territory; but he could not stand the strain and he has been obliged to place orders periodically, taking a pick of subjects that appealed to him as winners, and stopping the order for a while to give him a chance to recuperate. He stated positively that where he placed such an order and the subjects were in the neighborhood of 1,000 feet in length, his exchange lost money, but he was obliged to shoulder the loss in order to satisfy the exhibitors and the public demand, and thereby hold his trade. He declared that the beating of the film exchange around the 1,000-foot stump is an evil in the business that should be stopped.

The same old cry is being received regarding the moving pictures losing their grip on the public. This is heard every Spring. As that season ripens, a falling off in attendance becomes apparent, especially on days when the weather is nice for outdoor strolls and amusements. The pictures are stronger with the public to-day than ever they were, and no matter where or how great the falling off may be, the reopening of the indoor amusement season will find their drawing power as great, if not greater than ever. Don't be a week-kneed exhibitor.

An exhibitor writes for information as to the best program for a nickelodeon—dramatic, comic or scenic subjects. That is a hard question to answer with any degree of accuracy, for the reason that the managers, and not this paper, are the qualified judges in such matters. They are in direct touch with the pulse of their patrons and they vary considerably in tastes. No manager can satisfy an entire audience, but alertness on his part and by his employees will soon determine what a majority of his patrons want; and to complete the job a canvass of one night will not suffice. It is an established fact that what may go well with a Monday audience will very likely fall flat the next day. There are a great many people who attend picture shows once, or twice, and possibly three times a week, and they become recognized by managements as steady patrons. Almost invariably these people fix upon the same nights of each week for this form of amusement. It is the opinions and the tastes of these people that the manager must reach if he enters upon the pulse-testing task. The transient patron is not a good criterion. This subject is an old one, but it has been mastered by few. Those who have accomplished this are mostly men who have had some experience in the old line of theatricals. To master the matter does not necessarily require this experience, nor exceptional ability. Patience and diligent effort reach the public. The manager who is really only a ticket chopper or counter will always fall short of the mark.

There is an extraordinary demand throughout the country by exhibitors for photographs of the actors and actresses who play parts in the pictures produced by the several manufacturers. Reports reach us that if these photographs were supplied they would increase the receipts of every theater displaying them to a great extent. Managers say they are asked daily by regular patrons to secure photographs and display them in the lobbies of the theaters. When told that the pictures themselves are photographs the patrons say they want to get a closer view of the people—they want to see how they look outside or apart from the mimicry.

One of the latest schemes to excite the interest of the public in the pictures is a voting contest on the popularity of the productions of certain makers. It originated in a Western town through a discussion as to which firm was making the best pictures. We have received no definite returns from any of the contests and attribute this to the indefinite form in which the contests were framed. Late reports state that after starting the contests managers were confronted with the statement that to get an intelligent vote the issue should be clearly defined and the audience should know whether the decision should be upon the photography, the character of the subjects, the acting, scenic and stage arrangements and effects, costuming, etc., etc. It can be seen without the use of a magnifying glass that the manager who frames up and conducts a contest on this basis has a task on his hands that keeps him busy most of the time that the pictures are not on the sheet. When he gets through with it he should be qualified to hold himself before the public as a professional framer of platforms for political campaigns. The next scheme we expect to hear of is a voting contest to decide upon the most popular actor and actress in the various pictures. And, by the way, I think the scheme a good one. It is more simple than the other and more effective. It cannot be disputed that audiences have their picture-player favorites as the patrons of the regular theaters have. There is one big drawback to the scheme at present. The audiences must first know the names of the players. They will doubtless learn these in the near future when the manufacturers will see the advisability of acceding to the demand for display of the players' photographs in the lobbies.

A word to the manager who wishes to guard the reputation of his place and retain his patronage. Under no circumstances retain in your employ a piano player, singer or operator who is a masher. They do more harm to a place than a week's run of bad films. They are a pest to the public as well, and respectable people soon stop patronizing a house that employs them. I was in a house one night last week and the actions of the piano player were disgusting. He had secured enough money to purchase an Easter suit of the O, you Charlie! brand. He wore new, shining, tan shoes and socks of the most rapturous colors. These he persistently displayed during the intermission for the benefit of two respectable ladies who occupied seats in a location that enabled their eyes to feast upon the aforesaid socks of colors if they so desired, but they just as persistently refused to look. From remarks I overheard passing between them I am convinced that they will not visit the house again while that Adonis presides at the box of strings.

LOCAL SHOW ADVERTISING.

As space permits we will reproduce specimen advertisements of local advertising done by exhibitors. This week we show the advertisement of the Casino Theater, of Easton, Pa., and a reproduction of the reading notice that they get in that paper. We also show a reduced fac simile of the large half-page advertisement of Montgomery, the moving picture man, of Memphis. Mr. Montgomery was the first exhibitor to install a Mirror Screen in the South and he was so well pleased with the improved effect that he immediately telegraphed to

The Home of Biographs.

Over in the north-eas corner of Centre Square is the home of biographs, the Casino, Easton's theatre de luxe. Here you can see all the latest and best motion pictures, not those you have seen before. If you see it at the Casino you see it first, and the best of all a biograph picture every day. The Casino does not show cheap five cent vaudeville but the latest and best motion pictures produced. Pictures that are clean and amusing, instructive and dramatic, Western and war pictures. Special attention is given to ladies and children. One visit to the Casino and you will be convinced that it is the most popular theatre in Easton.

Shelbyville for another—for Mr. Montgomery runs more than one theater. We do not write this as a boost for the Mirror Screen, for it needs no boosting. It is simply a question of whether the exhibitor can stand the expense, as they do come high. It is worth this as a drawing card where there is keen competition, but then Mr. Montgomery was his own competitor, so he deserves all the more credit for wanting to give his patrons the best picture show obtainable—which he does.

Do You Know The Man Who Has Already Brought
Much of the World to Memphis?
DO YOU KNOW who has made it possible for the people of Memphis to know the world? Do you know who it is who actually brings the world to us day after day so you and I can see it? It is Montgomery, the Moving Picture man of Memphis?
Mohammed commanded the mountain to come to him. It didn't come. Montgomery commands the world to come and it comes. Montgomery doesn't wait. He came to Memphis two years ago, and since that time has made many trips out into the world, traveling more than 10,000 miles in his endeavor to give his patrons more and better things. He has visited all the motion picture theaters in the larger cities, searching everywhere for improvements. But there are none, because other theaters are busy trying to keep up with him and have no improvements to offer.
There are thousands and thousands of motion picture houses in the United States. Every city has its many, every village, no matter how small, has at least one, but no other city has a Montgomery
It is not the man who waits—It is the man who does things who succeeds
Montgomery was the first man in the South and one of the first in the world to see the possibilities of the new Mirror Screen and he didn't wait to see what others would do with it. Nor did he allow great expense to deter his making this improvement. Yesterday his patrons at No. 2 Majestic saw the results of this move, saw pictures as distinctly as though they were looking through a window. This morning one of these wonderful screens was ordered for No. 3
It is Montgomery who is bringing the world to Memphis. He brings us not only the scenes, but the customs of its people as well. He brings us not only the humorous side of life, but also the tragic and pathetic. He brings us not only the ordinary happenings, but the unusual things, too. We see in his three Majestic Theaters all the different phases of human life in all the different parts of the world.
It Is Montgomery, The Moving Picture Man of Memphis

WIIKESBARRE, AND SOMETHING UNIQUE.

F. H. Richardson.

Last week the writer went to Wilkesbarre, Pa., to strighten out some machine troubles and ran into something absolutely unique in projection, so far as his experience goes. I believe it will prove of interest to my friends and test their ingenuity to let them do some figuring and guessing, and I therefore invite them to send in their solution of the following. When the answers have all been received I will tell you the correct one. I might add that the thing had me up a tree for a couple of hours and I only solved it after having left the machine for the dinner table. You have all the data I had myself, now let's hear from you! The proposition was as follows: At normal speed, 60 a minute, the picture was perfect and it remained so until the speed reached very nearly 80 a minute (80 turns of the crank, I mean). At one particular speed, just about 80, the light would die down and flash up again with a wavering effect. The effect was not rhythmic and even but intermittent and uneven as to time. As soon as the speed dropped a trifle, or the machine was run just a little faster, either one, the effect disappeared. The current was 60-cycle alternating and the light (arc) itself as steady as a rock. The machine was one with a three-blade shutter in front of the projection lens. This was absolutely all the data I had to go on and I succeeded in figuring it out Can you? Send in your solutions.

Wilkesbarre has seven motion picture houses at present, with another to open this week, and they all seemed to be doing a fine business. I had very pleasant chats with some of the managers. One and all expressed themselves as well satisfied with the outlook. The picture projection was excellent in all the houses I visited. This speaks well for Wilkesbarre operators. Power's machines were in use in all the houses I visited but one. That one had a very old Edison Exhibition model. Quite a few were using motor-generator sets, taking direct current at 220 volts and delivering it at 54. Others used economy coils. There was both 220 direct and 110 alternating available. In a splendid location on the public square the Treon Company is just completing a beautiful 1,100-seat house to be devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville. The house will be managed by Mr. Dave Cohen, of New York City. It is beautifully finished in delicate green and gold, has two balconies, with elevator to carry passengers thereto, also a wide marble stair. The Savoy, for it will be known by that name, will compare favorably with any New York house of like class. Mr. M. D. Blewitt, of the Treon Company, showed me through the auditorium, which was then nearing completion, and evinced a very pardonable pride therein. The projection equipment will consist of Power's No. 6 machines, dissolver, spotlight, etc. The current will be direct, reduced to 54 volts by a motor-generator. Let me add, before closing, that I was exceedingly well pleased with what little I saw, in the limited time, of Wilkesbarre. It is a lively, hustling, little city of 75,000 souls, and "looked good to me."

Nothing reminds a person so much of a moving picture as the Vitagraph studio in its every detail. It is a constant scene of activity, from its perfected studios of directors, actors, musicians, scene painters, scene setters, property men, photographers and stage carpenters to and through its extensive engineering and electrical corps of experts and workers.

SUNDAY WORK.

A correspondent signing himself "A Brooklyn Moving Picture Employee" writes: "Permit me to say a few words in answer to your article published in The World, March 12th issue. In that article you say that the average working man or woman who must labor six days a week should be able to spend Sunday as he, or she, sees fit, without interference, so long as law, order and decency be duly observed. Now, Mr. Richardson, is not the moving picture theater employee a working man? Does he not labor six working days in the week? Is he to be considered as a thing apart from his fellow man; as a monstrosity who cannot enjoy one day of rest in seven, just the same as any other laborer? You say in the article in question that the theater should be kept open on Sunday for the amusement of the working men and women——" and thus the writer continues at some length, winding up with: "May I without imprudence ask: 'Where does the moving picture employee's day off come in? Sunday is the boss's best day and the one on which he figures to swell his receipts. Why may not the theater employee have one weekday off, therefore, on which to get away from the everlasting grind and enjoy himself?'"

I am very glad, friend Moving Picture Employee, that you have dragged this matter out into the light of day, and will say that your position, as set forth in the last sentence of your letter, is well taken. The theatrical business, legitimate or otherwise, is a peculiar one, and one wherein the largest business is done when almost every other class of labor is at rest. Moreover, the time when every other labor is resting is the very time it is most important, from their point of view, that the theaters be running. Of course, I take it that everyone entering the theatrical business is aware of the fact that it has its drawbacks, one of which is the fact that Sundays and holidays are its harvest time, and the days ordinarily known as days of rest are, as a matter of fact, the theater man's days of hardest toil. This the man well knows, surely, when he enters the business! Having entered the field with this knowledge, he must be prepared to "take his medicine" like a good little boy, or girl, and not cry over it. But it does not follow from this that the theatrical employee, moving picture or otherwise, should be compelled to work seven days a week. He should have one day off, yet except in the case of companies owning several theaters in one city, in which case a relief is easily arranged, the matter of a substitute for the operator is indeed a hard one. The manager naturally does not enthuse over the placing of a new man in the operating room for one night each week, even could one be had who is known to be thoroughly competent. You cannot blame him for this, remembering that his entire show, or the better portion of it, at least, depends on the Man-in-the-Booth; remembering, also, that in this every-hog-for-himself-and-the-devil-take-the-hindmost world of ours, the average manager is not doing any extra worrying over the fact that his employees have no day of rest. He will give you a day off if he is compelled to, not otherwise. That, my boy, is the way of the world. It is the actual condition labor confronts, except in comparatively rare cases. Here and there is found an employer who voluntarily looks out for the interest of the man who works for him. But that kind of a boss is rare enough to almost command a salary as star freak in a museum. And too often, when one is found, labor proceeds to take undue advantage of his kindness.

No, my friend, the moving picture employee should have a day off, but, under the present system of running things, labor will get precisely what it fights for and secures by its own strong right arm, and no more. The theaters should be open Sundays and holidays. You know that as well as I do. To close them would deprive all the people of much enjoyment to them that just a few might rest. The only right policy by which to govern our affairs is "the greatest good to the greatest number." Personally, the writer is opposed to even the stores being closed evenings. It is wrong from every point of view. Neither should the clerks have to work day and night. Double shift is the answer. And now let me say right here that every house running to exceed six hours should have a double shift of operators, unless half the program be something besides pictures. No man on earth is going to run pictures, one after the other, for even eight hours and do the best work. It isn't commonsense to expect it, either. But saving these things is largely unprofitable and a waste of good ink. As I have said, the moving picture employee, in common with other labor, will get days off, reduction of hours of labor and other things to be desired, when he, and she, compels the manager to grant them, and not one moment sooner. What "ought" to be is beside the question. It is what one fights for and gets that counts.

VOLTAGE AGAIN DISCUSSED.

Washington, March 30, 1910.

Publishers Moving Picture World:

Gentlemen—I cannot resist the temptation of butting in upon the controversy between Mr. Richardson and H. M. C. regarding "A Question of Voltage," as I consider H. M. C. correct, his only error consisting in using the expression "absorb." He did this, I imagine, with the idea of making it easier to follow by those not thoroughly familiar with electrical phenomenon.

The voltage is not absorbed, inasmuch as you could put two, three, or in fact any number of rheostats such as are used with moving picture arcs on 110-volt line in series across the 110-volt line, and still the volt drop through the entire series would be 110 volts, the current, of course, varying inversely as the net resistance.

Mr. Richardson, in his last letter (February 5), states that the resistance of the rheostat used upon the 110 volt line was slightly less than 4 ohms, or, to be exact, 3 2-3 ohms. This is an error, as the resistance of the rheostat plus that across the arc while burning, is equal to the amount mentioned.

That means that the resistance of rheostat is $\frac{65}{110}$ of 3 2-3 = 2 1-6 ohms, the other 1½ ohms being the resistance across arc (including the slight resistance of the carbons). This is assuming the arc to require 30 amperes at 45 volts, which is approximately correct for the average moving picture arc on direct current. Personally I have found the best results to be obtained by working at nearer 50 volts, and have worked satisfactorily for a few minutes at a time with an arc drawing 70 to 75 volts, this with a motor-generator set which we have at one of the theaters of which I am superintendent. This machine allows a great deal of latitude in that respect.

To come back to the matter in hand, on the 220-volt line we desire the same amperes to get the correct light at the arc as on the 110-volt. Therefore, as $\text{ohms} = \frac{\text{volts}}{\text{amperes}}$ we have X (required resistance of rheostat), plus 1½ ohms (resistance across arc while burning) $= \frac{220}{30}$. That is $X = \frac{220}{30} - 3\text{-}2 = 5\ 5\text{-}6$ ohms, the required resistance of rheostat on 220-volt line used with moving picture arc, this being nearly three times that necessary across 110-volt circuit.

As to the fifty series arcs mentioned by Mr. Richardson across the 2,500-volt line, he can easily figure them out by getting the idea impressed that the volt drop (as mentioned above) is not dependent only on the resistance but upon the resistance and the current. By inquiry he will find that the resistance of these series arcs while burning is (each) about six times that of the moving picture arc and that (or therefore) these arcs use only about five amperes each.

In spite of this, the voltage across each arc is the same about 50 volts, a very small part of which voltage is used to control the carbon feed mechanism.

The voltage drop through each part of a series circuit is exactly to the whole voltage across the main lines as the resistance of that part is to the resistance of the whole, no matter what the total voltage or resistance may be. The amperage, of course, varies as the old formulæ $\frac{\text{volts}}{\text{resistance}}$.

Of course, if you reduce your resistance or increase the voltage so that the amperage becomes higher than the line will carry, your line, or the weakest part of same, will burn out. When the arc is started the resistance for the moment that the carbons touch is lower, and consequently the amperage is higher, but this is for such a short interval of time that it does no harm. If the above is thoroughly digested I think it will also answer Mr. Richardson's question relative to the negative wire, etc.

As he states, we can have voltage without current, but voltage without current does no work and is of no practical use. We know it is there, but to use it, it must flow, and when it flows it is in the form of current.

Voltage and current are not separate entities, but merely the measurements of electricity, indicating how strong (the pressure) and how much (quantity). I may not have made clear what is desired, and if such is the case you can easily consign this lengthy epistle to the waste basket.

I thoroughly enjoy and appreciate most of Mr. Richardson's articles and feel sure I have learned a great deal from him since my advent into the motion picture business from my old one—photographer. Yours very truly,

ALAN J. BACHRACH,
Superintendent, Pastime and Metropolitan Theaters.

OPERATORS HIT BACK.

Cleveland, Ohio, March 29, 1910.

Editor Moving Picture World:

Dear Sir—In looking over The Moving Picture World I happened to notice a subject entitled "A New Race of Degenerates," by Mr. F. H. Hoffman.

I do not know who he is, but I do know that he is not an operator, and would not be a bit surprised if he is not connected with any show or film exchange, but an outsider altogether, from the way he talks about the operators. Anyone who did not know them would think they were not human and did not wear any clothes, or that they were insane. I do not know that you could blame an operator if he did go crazy, as managers seem to think an operator is just the same as a machine and can work eight, ten or twelve hours at a time without getting out of his chicken coop, which is worse than a cell, for you can look through a cell most any place, but in an operating room you have about three or four holes to look through, and then all you can see is a silent drama, comedy, or maybe an illustrated song. He also speaks about nicknaming among the operators. Well, I will concede that much to him, but I think there is an excuse for that, as I know that I can get an introduction to a person one day and meet him again and cannot recall his name, and I do not think I am the only one in the world that is that way, either. I would like to say that all operators, with a very few exceptions, are gentlemen in every sense of the word and that they respect ladies more than most managers of picture shows or employees of the film exchange. I have seen a lot of managers stand at the door and take tickets and make remarks about every woman that came in, or even those who walked along the streets. As for the film exchange employees, they will tell a lady who comes after the films for the show, to go to h—l just as soon as they will a man. In most of the city film exchanges, if an operator goes after the films (which is not his work, but is done as a favor to the managers), he has to ask as many as five or six times, and maybe then be told that it is not in yet, and then he is late anywhere from thirty minutes to an hour, for which he gets ripped up the back when he reports at the show.

Yours truly,
BYRON CARRIER,
Operator, Crescent Theater.

AS IT IS IN LIFE

The Story of a Father's Selfish Love

We are all prone to forget, and forgetfulness makes us unwittingly selfish. We deny in our children the very things we did ourselves. Here is a man, left, through the death of his wife, the care of his only child, a girl of twelve years. He, it is true, makes many sacrifices for her sake, declining to marry again that he may the better provide for her. It is the usual story. She grows to womanhood and falls in love. She is made to choose between her lover and her father. She makes the reasonable choice and is married. It is only after several years that the father is made to admit how selfish and narrow-minded he had been.

A RICH REVENGE

A Comedy of the California Oil Fields

Here is a warning to all who are of a revengeful nature, as the plans may sometimes revert to our chagrin if not disaster. The two young fellows are rivals for the hand of a pretty girl of the village, and after her marriage with the one of her choice, the other swears to be revenged. To effect this he pours chemically treated oil into the irrigation ditches of the husband's farm. This, of course, ruins the land for vegetation, but it brings the husband a fabulous sum from a speculator in oil lands, who thinks he has struck a highly productive oil field.

A RICH REVENGE.—A comedy of the California oil fields. Vengeance is ethical, as it is directed by fate, and is invariably just in resultance; but revenge is generally the designing of a fevered brain, and is nearly always resilient, inflicting chagrin, if not disaster, upon the perpetrator. While the instance in this Biograph comedy meted not disaster, still it produced chagrin a-plenty. Harry and Bill, two young ranch-owners, are deeply smitten with the charms of pretty little Jennie, the belle of the neighborhood. Jennie is as lively as a cricket, never serious a moment, hence the solemn tones in which Bill declares his love frightens her; but Harry, jolly and light-hearted, seeming to consider life a huge joke, appeals to her, and she accepts his proposal. They are married and start on their new life's journey more like a couple of kids "playing house," than serious, sober married folks. Bill, of course, is enraged at being thrown down, and swears to be revenged. Hence, he bides his time. First he induces the villagers and storekeepers to boycott Harry by refusing to buy the products of his farm. Harry's farm, like many others in California, is irrigated by means of a flume, the gate of which opened, sends water through ditches to all parts of his ranch. Into this flume Bill pours several barrels of chemically treated oil, which ruins the productive quality of the land so saturated. Harry and Jennie are in sore straits, and cannot imagine why their land is so bald. While they are thus bemoaning their helplessness, an oil speculator is seen to drive along the road. He suddenly pulls his horse up, for a delightful odor has titillated his olfactory nerve. Leaping out of his carriage, he makes for the field. Jabbing his proboscis into the center of one of the rows, he sniffs. "Oil, by gosh! and the poor fools don't know it. Here's a find." Rushing up to the house, where he finds Harry and Jennie still sitting on the veranda in deep despair, he offers them $10,000 for their land. They are so flabbergasted that they can but nod their heads. The speculator promises to call back in an hour with the money. An hour has elapsed and no speculator; then they feel that it has been but a dream. However, after consulting several clocks they find that they indicate time so divergently that there may still be hope, and this thought is prophetic, for in a few minutes the man arrives with a wad of "long green." "Ten thousand dollars! What'll we do with it?" It doesn't take long to decide, for in a short while they have togged up and procuring an automobile, they start for the East. As they bowl along the road they see the speculator with his laborers just about to start digging when Bill comes up, and proves he has been done, for instead of an oil field he has a "lemon patch." Harry and Jennie, by this time, are out of reach. Bill's move was indeed a rich revenge slightly twisted.

AS IT IS IN LIFE.—Shakespeare wrote that "Life is as tedious as a twice- told tale vexing the dull ear of a drowsy man," which may be true in many instances, but the philosophical will contend that life is what we make it. It is in our power to generate sunshine sufficient to dissipate the threatening clouds of sorrow. Man, by nature, is prone to be unreasonable, selfish and thoughtless; though these traits be hidden even to our own discerning, still they are there and it is for us to curb them. Love, the most commendable virtue, is itself unreasonable, as this Biograph subject will illustrate, and how parental love may be so extreme as to be selfish. George Forrester has suffered the loss of his beloved wife, the mother of his little ten-year-old child. The child is forced to become his little housekeeper, while Forrester secures work at the pigeon farm. While thus employed, he meets a former sweetheart and renews his attentions, feeling that she might prove a second mother to his child; but, no, on serious consideration he realizes that he could not meet the wants of a second wife, as he finds that her tastes are extravagant, and do his duty to his child, hence he determines to sacrifice his own happiness for the sake of his child, sending her off to school that she may rise above her present environment, while he toils to make ends meet. Several years later we find the girl returning from school, having now grown to young womanhood. She is surprised and grieved to see such a change in her father. As she views his almost decrepit form, she exclaims: "Worn hands, gray hairs, and all for me. Father, I shall never leave you." Ah, but what a rash resolution. Little do we know what fate is designing. She, of course, meets "the" young man. They love each other honestly and devotedly, but the father is unreasonably jealous, and tries to keep them apart, but this is impossible, so in a fit of rage he bids the girl to choose between him and her lover. She chooses the lover, feeling that her dear father would relent. He does not, however, and refuses to either sanction her marriage or visit the couple afterwards, living his life alone in his little cottage. About two years later, the young wife is so wrapped up in her baby that she considers it a slight on the part of anyone who passes it by without enthusiastic notice. Of course, they all tell her her baby is very cute and pretty, but they rebel at being obliged to think of nothing else. She feels that nobody appreciates her baby, so she decides to brave her fears and pay a visit to her father, hoping that the baby may soften his iron will. Cautiously entering the garden, she finds her father the picture of despair, seated on a bench in the arbor. Approaching him noiselessly, she places her baby on its grandpop's knees. It was as the young wife hoped, and we leave the scene with the child and the grandchild folded in the old man's arms.

SANDY, THE SUBSTITUTE.—While engaged in a card game with some of the "boys," Sandy Smith, the hero of the story, received a letter from his friend, Jim Malone, sheriff of the county, asking him to trail a notorious train robber who is hiding in the mountains where perpetual snow is almost a barrier to intrusion. Malone tells Sandy that he is suffering with a wounded arm and cannot go himself. In order to secure Sandy's services he reminds him that he once saved his life. Sandy deliberates, unwilling at first to act as the hunter of his fellowman, even though he be a criminal, but the reminder of the debt of gratitude he owes proves a convincing argument and he finally undertakes the perilous mission. He calls on the sheriff, gets his final instructions and starts. He finds the trail and captures the desperado after a dramatic encounter, in which the devoted wife of the outlaw, Weatherford, is forced by Sandy to shackle the two men to each other and destroy the firearms which were in their stronghold.

Bound as described, the two men start on a desolate journey through the frozen snow. Day and night, faint from hunger and exhaustion, they march lock-step, stumbling and falling in the deep snow only to rise and continue on their journey, Sandy's gun constantly trained on the man before him. All the suffering and pathos of this dreary march, as described in Mr. Norton's story, is vividly brought out by the wonderful scenic effects and acting in the picture. The two last scenes show: First, the two men falling headlong into the saloon where are assembled a number of men in company with the sheriff, and where Sandy "turns over" his man to the sheriff; second, Sandy's surprise and indignation at learning that he has earned five thousand dollars "blood money."

He relieves his mind and disposes of the reward by sending the money to Weatherford's wife with a characteristic note. The action at this point is deeply pathetic, though there runs through it that vein of comedy which is peculiar to Mr. Norton and which will no doubt produce the smile and the tear so much sought by the writer and the actor.

KING COTTON.—The picture starts by showing the different stages of development of the cotton boll, and then proceeds with the plantation scenes showing the real Southern negro, of which "Old Black Joe" is a familiar type, at work in the fields. There are men and women and even pickaninnies, and the character studies are both amusing and interesting as we watch them gather the cotton and bring it to the scales. We follow their handling of it through the ginning, pressing and loading for the street markets. This latter scene on the main street of Rome, Ga., shows the mule teams loaded with the cotton and the buying and selling preparatory to its going to the warehouse for sampling, classing, etc., each separate process being shown in a remarkable series of clear and distinct pictures. When it comes to the manufacturing the old and the new methods are contrasted.

We see the old colored woman carding and spinning, and then the scene shifts to the most perfect new machinery, with all its wonderful detail for carrying on the same process to-day. We see the old mill with its water wheel and then the gigantic plant where the manufacturing is now done. In contrast to the weaving by the thousand-and-one looms in the great building, one picture shows an elderly lady seated at her century old hand loom performing the same operation as it was managed years and years ago. There is no skipping in the telling of the story, and each handling of the material follows in regular order till we see the white fabric woven and packed in bales and even put into carts addressed to far away China, South America, etc. The picture closes with a tableau of all the nations paying tribute to King Cotton.

FOR HER SISTER'S SAKE.—The night was auspicious for a lover who could both do and dare, and the tall, handsome, manly youth who had secreted himself in the shrubbery felt that his plans were now to be crowned with success. The cruel father who had forbidden him the house was incautiously taking his departure for an evening at the millionaire's club, and the sweet girl upon whom our hero lavished his affections had given him the signal that the coast was clear. But, ah! Alas for love's strategem, the "Angel Child," whom he had quite forgotten, was wide awake and on the job!

How she overheard their plans for an elopement, how she locked her sister in her room and how she dropped the key down the hero's back, are better seen than described. And how love found a way in spite of the "Angel Child's" precocious vigilance is a part of the story which should not be told in advance. Enough to say this is one of the few comedies in which the child plays the principal part, and in which, aside from the fun of the individual scenes, there is an intensely interesting and laughable story moving rapidly and humorously to a "thrilling" climax.

HER FIRST APPEARANCE.—Van Bibber, a thoroughly delightful man of the world who has not been spoiled by society conventionality, and the child whom he rescues will appeal to every lover of the best in life. Some of the story of the "littlest" girl's parentage, which is only hinted at in Davis' book, is fully given in the film; and we understand pretty clearly why the wronged father has wanted to cast the mother and her child out of his heart, why he has remained in ignorance of the death of the mother and the fate of the little one, and also why, when Van Bibber finds her making "Her First Appearance" before the footlights, he resolves to take her from the life of the stage and restore her to her father, whether the father will or no. The scenes show the young society man, who has been lounging behind the scenes, carrying the "littlest" girl to her dressing room where he learns from her foster mother that she is really the child of his old friend and of that friend's unhappy marriage, which he will be shown in the opening series to have done everything in his power to prevent. Being a man of decision as well as of good heart Van Bibber takes her in the taxicab to the home of her father and urges him to receive the child into his house and affections.

Remembering his wrongs, the father refuses to welcome her, but when Van Bibber announces that he will adopt the child and she shall become his and fill the place in his life which she should fill in the empty heart of her father, the father hesitates and by that hesitation loses his firmness and gains a daughter—a pleasing climax to a sad story.

THE RANGER'S BRIDE.—The story concerns Bill Dunham, a droll cow-puncher, who finds that home without a wife may have its advantages, "but durned few," and a good woman who can sew on buttons and make flapjacks is worth more than much silver and gold and the liberties of single blessedness.

Opportunity knocks at Bill's door. Indeed, it comes in the form, almost, of a veritable slap in the face, a flagrant dare, an invitation as a guest of honor at Dame Opportunity's table—and it comes at the psychological moment when Bill is struggling with a shirt that needs mending and in the form of an advertisement in the "Mustang Bugle" to the effect that "a lone spinster, with a large fortune, who can cook and sew, desires a husband."

So Bill writes a letter to the spinster stating that he will be her tootsum henceforth and forevermore, with instructions how to reach the village of Mustang.

Bill's secret, however, becomes public property when the boys, his pals, follow him to the mail box and get the letter. It is a revelation and a surprise, to think that their Bill would make a matrimonial venture. No! No! Something must be done to prevent the marriage.

There is much scheming among them before the day the spinster is, or was, due to arrive, and in the meantime the boys have hatched up a good scheme.

Bill arises early on the day of his wedding, makes a grand toilet, dons a "biled" shirt and enlists the help of the boys in getting into a white collar.

In the meantime two of the boys have rigged out, one as a woman and the other as a clergyman, with female and clerical garb, respectively. At last the stage is due and the spinster and clergyman ride down to meet it. The two are loaded into the stage and the other boys return to get the groom.

Bill is reluctant about parting with his gun, but who ever heard of wearing artillery to a wedding? However, it is impossible to persuade him to part with his chaps, and it is an amazing spectacle he presents, togged out in an outreagous costume, half dress suit and half cowboy costume!

In the end he meets the spinster, an affectionate creature with a face like a hatchet. Bill is paralyzed when he sees her, and when the parson steps forth to officiate, Bill breaks loose from the boys and runs down the road, wildly shouting for help, with the boys, the spinster and the parson in pursuit.

After a comical chase, Bill, whose short legs and heavy body will not permit him to cover much ground, is overhauled and forced to marry the spinster. But when he is left alone with the damsel something about the make-up of the latter arouses his suspicions, and jerking off his pal's wig the revelation is complete.

At first inclined to fight, he is soon pacified, and laughs at the joke, happy to think that it is a joke. In the end Bill is completely cured of "that lovin' feelin'" and resolves that single blessedness with its many disadvantages is better than taking a hand in the game of matrimony.

THE WISE GUY. At the breakfast table, Mrs Bluffem reads an item in the morning's paper which voices a warning to business men: "Be wary of a blue-eyed maiden who will enter your office, state that she is Brown's stenographer across the hall, that Mr. Brown left the office without cashing the check for her salary, and would you be so kind as to accommodate her, etc., etc." Mrs. Bluffem calls her husband's attention to the item and asks him to read it. But, no, no! He has no time for newspaper quibbage, he must catch his downtown car.

"But you ought to know," persists Mrs. Bluffem.

But Bluffem waves her proudly aside with a superior look of all-knowing intelligence.

"No one could fool me, my dear," he says. "They would have to be very slick, indeed."

The scene changes to Bluffem's office, the time, 5.15 p. m. Bluffem's own unattractive type-pounder has left for the day and his nibs, with his feet cocked on his desk, lights a cigar and sits musing and ruminating over the big deal he has just closed

Suddenly there is a knock at the door and in answer to Bluffem's gruff invitation to come in, the door swings open and a shy maiden, with large blue eyes, demure demeanor, etc. (you know her) quietly enters, asking with just the right amount of slight confusion if Mr. Bluffem would be so kind as to accommodate her about a check, which her employer, et cetera.

When Bluffem sees the girl, he swings his feet hurriedly from the desk and arises bowing. Unusually susceptible to a "sweet young thing," Bluffem eagerly walks into the trap, and a few moments later when the door closes behind his visitor he arises and with that "oh, you kid" expression begins whistling something about "those bewitching eyes."

That evening Mrs. Bluffem calls her husband's attention to the newspaper item and asks if she shall read it. With a bored ezpression Bluffem consents.

As she reads, her husband becomes keenly attentive, and in the reading of the description of the adventuress who has been preying upon downtown business men Bluffem starts, his mouth opens and he slowly drags the bogus check from his pocket. While his wife continues to read he deftly crumples it and sinks back in his chair.

"Why, John," his wife exclaims, "was not that a check you destroyed!"

"No, no, my dear," he returns, "it was just a little notice electing me a member of the goat club —that's all!"

THEIR SEA VOYAGE.—Dick White, so the story goes, tires of the humdrumness of married life and sighs regretfully as he recalls the short days and long nights of single blessedness. To be free again for a day, a week, or two weeks, just to experience once more a little season of midnight suppers, frolicsome girls and joy rides is what he longs for. His morose mood finally attracts the attention of his wife, who inquires if he is not feeling well. Happy thought! Dick gobbles the cue and a brilliant idea takes form in his mind. "Ill? Of course he is ill; indeed, he feels that his days are numbered." A doctor is hurriedly summoned and of course is "put next" by Dick before the examination. As a result the doctor shows surprise and alarm during the examination and informs Mrs. White that what Dickie needs is rest and quiet and a sea voyage—positively a sea voyage.

When the doctor leaves Dick calls up Johnny Graham, an old pal, and tells him to come over immediately. When the latter arrives, much worried over his friend's apparent illness, Dick gets him alone and chucks him in the ribs.

"I'm not ill, you idiot!" he laughs. "Can't you see the joke! It's this way: I have a sort of sneakin' feeling to shake the bonds of matrimony for a season and revel once more under the glittering lights of old Broadway with the merry, merry girls, the honk-honk wagons and the midnight lobsters. Are you nezt? Eh?"

Then Dick unravels the fable of the sea voyage, how he fixed it with the M.D., and how easily they can give their wives the slip. John takes him up and says he can very easily arrange it with his own wife.

It is amusing to what a degree the schemers "fix things." Steamship routes are discussed and continental guides digested, until the great day of the "sailing." The two wives are left together and the two husbands take the train for New York, "where they will engage passage on the Montannia, which sails the next morning."

Two days later, while the wives are discussing poor Dick's sad state of health, the maid rushes into the room with a paper which announces startling news: "The Montannia has sunk with all on board; not a person saved!"

Of course, the tragedy is almost unspeakable to the two poor little wives who will never again see their darling Jackie and Dickie; and here we will draw the curtain and endeavor to locate in the throng of merrymakers of those Forty-second street cafes our two revelers and renegades.

We find them at a stage door waiting for two show girls. Of course, they have been too busy to have read of the Montannia disaster. We follow them and two girls to a swell cafe, and the nezt morning we find them in their room at the hotel—a room littered with poker chips and playing cards—preparing to return home. As positive proof of their sea voyage they have purchased a quantity of "White Star Line" stickers, which they apply to their suit cases.

Later we see them alight from an auto in front of Dick's home. The latter is "much improved in health" when the two men enter the parlor. Then they see the two life-sized portraits of themselves, decked out with crepe and wreaths of mourning! "Great Scott! What is this?" The maid enters, sees them and believing them ghosts flies out of the room. The two wives enter and when they are really satisfied that the two are not apparitions but real flesh and blood, they begin questioning them as to how they were saved.

You may imagine the closing scenes when they learn of the sinking of the Montannia in mid-ocean and all on board lost! Of course, no excuses are possible, and the two unfortunate young fellows get their just deserts.

GAUMONT.
(George Kleine.)

A DRAMA OF THE MOUNTAIN PASS.—The first scene shows us a tavern in a mountain village of the Pyrenees. The innkeeper advises a number of tourists to make a trip in the hills. One of the group prefers remaining, but the others, acting upon the innkeeper's suggestion, start with the guide for a mountain-climbing expedition. Post-haste the innkeeper's son is sent to inform a number of hillsmen that wealthy tourists are in the mountains. The hillsmen attack the tourists later and secure what valuables they have with them.

Meantime the one who has remained at the tavern becomes suspicious of the keeper and guide and upon the return of the others agrees to wager that he can make the trip in safety. By a clever ruse he does so and establishes the guilt of the proper parties.

POETRY OF THE WATERS.—It is not only difficult, but almost impossible to tell you the beauties of this production. A series of some ten views taken off the southern coast of France and showing early morning, brilliant noontime, and darkening evening as seen by an artist of undoubted ability.

THE KISS WAS MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD.—The first scene is that of the public square in historic Athens on the day of the departure of the soldiery to battle against the Lacedonians. From the heights upon which the city is builded we are afforded an excellent view of the Ægean Sea, while in the foreground details in the architecture and costumes of that time have been perfectly reproduced. Here, in spite of the pleadings of the women and children, the men form into line of march and betake themselves to the boats.

Among the women, one Lysistrata, wife of the commander, stands out by her obstinacy against letting the soldiers go. But scarcely have they left before Lysistrata harangues the women and advises them not to give their husbands a single kiss when they return, until peace has been declared. To this they all agree and seal their vows clared. To this they all agree and seal their vows by sacred oaths and ceremonies. They then appoint a regular relay of watchers to warn them of the army's return. Ere long from the height of the ramparts the woman who is keeping watch notes the soldiers' arrival. She runs to warn the women, who hasten to adorn themselves. At last, the husbands arrive. They break the ranks and rush toward their better-halves in joy; but the wives receive them frigidly.

The husbands rush forward to kiss them, but they are coldly repulsed. They then return to their homes, in several of which we are permitted to watch the pleadings of the disappointed masters. Next, the soldiers meet in the public square and tell their woes to the General, who shrugs his shoulders unbelievingly and assures them he will see for himself if the women are rebellious.

In the General's Home.—A well-played scene whre the General is repulsed by his wife. He at last decides that he will make peace. The good news is announced to the women, who fall into their husbands' arms, and a shower of kisses in different ways on different faces takes place.

URBAN-ECLIPSE.
(George Kleine.)

THE FLY PEST.—The series of pictures, which is entitled "The Fly Pest," shows flies (as big as Plymouth Rock hens, as they appear on the screen) laying eggs in putrid meat; the eggs in white masses; the maggots in writhing heaps as they emerge from the eggs, and in different stages of their growth as maggots, until they burrow in the dirt to enter the pupa state; the pupæ (or grubs) themselves, one day later; flies emerging from the filth, at first wingless; then the perfect adult fly. Then follow pictures, stretching across the screen, of a fly taking a sip of honey from the point of a needle, showing the action of the proboscis, very like an elephant's trunk in miniature; of the tongue, and of the foot, also enormously enlarged, and with every microscopic hair distinct.

The second act of this little life-history is entitled: "How Flies Carry Contagion." In it these scenes follow one another in rapid succession, so that the most thoughtless spectator cannot fail to grasp their full significance: Flies swarming on putrid fish; crawling over lumps of sugar; in a cuspidor; on the nipple of a baby's feeding bottle; and, last of all, a pretty baby placidly sucking the mouthpiece from which the flies have just departed.

HER FATHER'S CHOICE.—A drama so well acted and lucid in plot that description is practically unnecessary. Love scenes are uppermost, but the cowardice of her father's choice makes it possible for the "only man" to win his sweetheart.

LUBIN MFG. CO.

THE RIGHT HOUSE—BUT.—The maid, on her afternoon off, meets a young man who assists her to pick up the bundles she has dropped. He escorts her to her home and at the parting begs her card. She has none, so hands him one of her mistress' that she is carrying for effect, never supposing that he will try to anticipate the planned meeting for her next afternoon off by writing. But the gallant lover is hard hit, and that night he writes to beg an appointment for the next day and mentions the place of meeting. The letter, of course, goes to the mistress and a jealous husband snatches it from her hand. He is wild with rage, and heedless of her protestations of innocence posts off to the meeting place around the corner. Pouncing upon the unconscious youth, he hustles him back to the house and confronts his faithless wife with her lover. The scene loses somewhat of its dramatic effect through the bewilderment of the wife and man, neither of whom recognizes the other, and the situation is growing embarrassing when the advent of the maid explains matters and she and her young man become too busy to notice the abject manner in which the husband sues for pardon. It is a lively little story briskly told by the experienced Lubin farceurs and there are plenty of hearty laughs scattered through its short length.

FIRST LOVE IS BEST.—Two girls, happy in their humble but comfortable home, hear the call of the city. The younger decides to go to town, and despite the urgings of her sister and the old folks she carries out her determination, to the great distress of her sweetheart. Unlike many others who are lured by the life of the city, she soon finds employment in an artificial flower factory and there she falls in love with the assistant foreman, an ingratiating young fellow, who wins her affection only to gain possession of her small earnings on the pretense that he needs it to help furnish their little home. He does not come to the factory the next morning, but sends a note to the foreman telling him to give the job to someone else, as he does not need to work. The country girl is prostrated by the blow to her love and trust and, sick of the city, turns her steps towards home, where the old folks welcome her, glad that no worse harm has befallen her. Some time later the other girl, undaunted by her sister's fate, fares forth to accept a position as waitress. At the restaurant she attracts the attention of one of the patrons, who persuades her to consent to a meeting in the park. He is no laggard in love and quickly wins her heart. The girl, in her gladness, writes her sister of this wonderful new love and encloses the man's photograph, one of the cheap postal card portraits. Horrified by the discovery that the picture is that of the man who has wrecked her own life, the girl hurries to the city, attended by her country sweetheart and the young fellow who wants to marry the other. By chance the trio encounter the loving couple on the street. The girl denounces her former sweetheart as a swindler and the sister suffers a revulsion of feeling. The two rustic swains pummel the thievish rogue, who slinks away without protest, and the four return to the peaceful country town, the two girls convinced that, after all, first love is best.

Great care has been taken in this production to provide contrast of environment as well as of personality, and the scenes in city and country are sharply distinct. In the factory, several hundred dollars' worth of artificial flowers aid the realism of the scene.

PATHE FRERES.

THE GOOD BOSS.—This story opens with a picture of the interior of a carpenter shop. One of the workmen is being criticised by the foreman, and the argument finally ends in the workman quitting his job. Mr. Jones, the proprietor, remonstrates with the fellow, but it is of no use, and he goes home to his wife and little daughter, who, anticipating a hard time with husband and father out of work plead with him to return. This he decides to do when he receives a note from his employer asking him to return, but the messenger unfortunately laughs at him, and the man being somewhat childish in nature, changes his mind and swears he will not return. Later on in the day, after his anger has been rankling in his breast, he seeks the shop and lying in wait for the foreman tries to stab him, but in the scuffle the knife is turned upon himself, and he is sent to the hospital with a deep wound in his breast. After weeks of illness, during which time Mr. Jones has taken care of his helpless family, the workman returns to his house and finding the evidence of the kindness of his former employer, his better nature asserts itself and he goes back to the shop, apologizes for his actions and is received most kindly by the proprietor. In the last scene the changed man is seen hard at work.

AGRA.—This film presents a series of remarkably colored, interesting views of native life in one of the largest cities of the Indian Empire. Interesting street views, gaily garbed natives, modes of transportation, and caravans of camels starting on a journey are successively shown. The training of the sacred monkeys in their mountain home is presented, and a number of scenes showing a native fakir exhibiting his troop of animals, which includes an intelligent monkey, a marvelously agile goat, a little bear cub, and several other interesting beasts. This entire film is colored with great care.

THE VINTAGE.—Few people who drink wine, and almost none of those who do not, know how wine is made except in a general sort of way. This film shows the vineyards on the sunny slopes of the hills of Southern France. The peasants are gathering great bunches of purple grapes and putting them in big wicker baskets, in which they are carried on long sticks to the pressing room. Here they are thrown into a big wine press, a circular affair, made up of sections through which the juice of the grapes may run as they are being pressed out. The blood red juice is shown trickling from the press into a large vat, in which it is kept until it begins to ferment, when it is poured into large casks and sealed to wait the proper time when it is sampled by an expert who can tell with a single taste whether the wine is of proper quality to be put upon the market. The last scene shows the sampler at work, and it is evident that he enjoys his job.

PAULA PETERS AND HER TRAINED ANIMALS.—Paula Peters, the trainer, shows a series of tricks executed by her marvelously well trained troop of horses and dogs, assisted by two or three clever monkeys. The horse, a snow white animal performs most entertainingly, and a graceful wolf hound does some marvelous jumping stunts, while her little poodle dogs and her monkeys also present an entertainment which the children will go wild over.

A HASTY OPERATION.—A peaceable pedestrian is insulted and roughly handled by an irascible children's nurse of corpulent proportions. The unfortunate man suffers such serious injury that it is considered advisable to take him to the hospital, where, after examination, it is decided to amputate his leg. The operation is carried out with ferocious joy by the exultant doctors, and proves successful, but the patient, in an excess of anger and terror, runs away, using the one leg left him to the best possible advantage. Pursued by a host of students and doctors, he mounts upon a bicycle, outstrips his pursuers, swims across a river, and perceiving that he is far ahead of his torturers, joyously executes a few acrobatic feats. The hospital members reappear, however, and to avoid capture the one-legged acrobat jumps on a horse and gallops off. He is approaching his own residence, when he observes the primary cause of his own misfortune, and quickly dismounting, punishes her with a thoroughness that is perhaps excusable in the circumstances. The students and doctors, however, having recovered their lost ground, intervene, and believing the corpulent female to be transgressed, avenge the lady's honor by bestowing a second drubbing on the unfortunate pedestrian.

HONEST PEGGY.—The gentleman who has lost the pocketbook has just completed a sale of property, and on his return home is horrified to discover his loss. He hastens to the police station and is overjoyed at recovering the notebook. He is informed that the finder was a little girl, and requests that inquiries be made concerning her. The report furnished to him is to the effect that the child is an orphan, without friends or relations, and he and his wife, having no children of their own to brighten their home, decide to adopt her. This they do, and a future hitherto undreamt of opens out before the little orphan.

THE DUCHESS DE LANGEAIS.—The Duchess de Langeais was one of the reigning belles of Paris, the pet of society, the envy of the women and the admiration of all the men. Her many conquests led her to believe herself to be irresistible, and when the famous General de Meyran failed to appreciate her charms, her vanity was piqued, and she determined to not only humble him in her own eyes, but in the eyes of all her friends. She had met him at an assembly at a friend's home, where he seemed suffering from ennui. Nothing amused this blase soldier, the music was poor, the chattering of the ladies was uninteresting, and altogether he seemed to be having a very poor time. So distinguished did he appear that the Duchess desired that he be presented to her. This was done, but the General, instead of seeming pleased, immediately makes his adieus and takes his departure. The character of the General in its calmness and dignity is a distinct contrast to the nature of the frivolous Duchess, and his coldness determines the coquettish young lady to bring him to her feet. In order to do this, she grants him a special favor by inviting him to a tete-a-tete in her own home. The General accepts the invitation and beneath the warm hospitality his indifference melts and he yields to the charm of his hostess. Finally falling at her feet, he is about to profess his love and admiration for her, when the door is opened and the personal friends of the Duchess, whom she has induced to wait for this critical moment in the ante-room, enter, laughing slyly at the General's discomfiture. Deeply wounded and angered, the General takes his departure. After he is gone, the Duchess d Langeais realizes that she, too, has finally fallen deeply in love, but too late. She hastens to the General's office and seeks admittance. This is at first refused, but when she threatens to do herself some injury if he doesn't receive her, the austere soldier consents. When she is admitted, she throws herself at his feet and asks his forgiveness. This he sternly refuses, and immediately thereafter the Duchess disappears from Parisian society.

Five years later, General de Meyran receives a commission from Ferdinand VII. of Spain, and while establishing order in Formentera he visits the convent of the Order of the Carmelite Nuns. While passing through the chapel, he recognizes in the garb of a nun his former love, the Duchess de Langeais. The recognition is mutual and the Duchess flees to her cell. That night the General, with two friends, resolves to take her by force from the convent, and having forced an entrance they wander along the quiet passage until they find the door marked with the name which the Duchess has adopted at the time of her taking the veil. They enter, alas, too late; the excitement of seeing her love in such a place, after five years of separation, has proved too much for the Duchess, and she has died, and here in the lonely cell they find her body laid upon a rude bier, with a dim light of candles flickering on her pallid face. The Mother Superior now enters and sternly orders them to retire. This they do, after the General has imprinted his first and last kiss on the cold lips of his dead love.

THE COMMON ENEMY.—Let us imagine ourselves ack to the perlod of turmoil and strife and fight of brother against brother, in 1860-1864. In the States, at that time, guerrillas, better known as "unlawful warfarers," were the pest and fear of both North and South. We see a Southern family gathering, interrupted by this fearful band. Their behavior in the home brings to the rescue of her mistress the old negro mammy, the family cook, who is daunted by nothing. A secret message is dispatched by the young daughter to Col. Morgan's camp—the anxious household awaiting with abated breath the result. The child, determined to reach her father, is wounded by a picket before her identity is known. Message received Morgan commands, surrounds and annihilates the guerrillas.

HUGO THE HUNCHBACK.—Hugo, the hunchback sculptor, maltreated by his master, and likewise by Bertrand, born of nobility, and affianced to Blanca. After Hugo's wares have been broken by Bertrand, it is only by the intercession of the priest, Silveria, that he is protected from a crowd of citizens.

By Royal command, Bertrand is made to wed Princess Olivia, rejecting Blanca, and her child born of their love. Hugo, at the request of the priest, tries to induce Bertrand not to desert Bianca and his child, but to no avail. Upon the reporting of this result to Blanca, she wends her way to the sea, bent upon suicide, rather than disgrace. She plunges into the waters with her babe. Hugo rescues her.

Twenty Years Later.—Hugo, famous and prosperous sculptor; Bertrand, a beggar through dissipation. In this picture of devotion and desertion we see happiness, contentment and satisfaction.

THE CLAY BAKER.—Peter Denig, an old German potter, lived and died in the village of Mont Alto, Pennsylvania. His chief ambition in life was a desire to make china that would be unbreakable. His life was one of struggle, hardships, starving, and an unconquerable persistence which ultimately was rewarded with all the blessings of life. Through the story of "The Clay Baker" there runs a pretty love romance and a happy blending of sadness and joy happy blending which is essential in making dramatic work effective, and which, together with the fine acting of William V. Mong, in the role of the old clay baker, has given the play a place among the modern classics. Joseph Hague, writing for the Dramatic Mirror, has said: "'The Clay Baker' is a dramatic gem, and whether developed by literary ability or histrionic powers, bears a close relationship to those created and made immortal by Joseph Jefferson."

DOROTHY AND SCARECROW IN OZ.—Dorothy and the Scarecrow are now in the Emerald City. They have become friendly with the Wizard, and together with the woodman, the cowardly lion and several new creations equally delightful, they journey through Oz—the earthquake—and into the glass city. The Scarecrow is elated to think he is going to get his brains at last and be like other men are; the Tin-Woodman is bent upon getting a heart, and the cowardly lion pleads with the great Oz for courage. All these are granted by his Highness. Dorothy picks the Princess. The Dangerous Mangaboos. Into the black pit and out again.—We then see Jim, the cab horse, and myriads of pleasant surprises that hold and fascinate.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY.

THE TONGUE OF SCANDAL.—Two young persons, Tom Dexter and Bessie Bolton, are very much in love with each other; they are almost inseparable. The village gossips, for the want of something better to do, ventilate their opinions about the matter. Tom persuades Bessie to become his wife and they go to another county to get married, agreeing to keep their wedding a secret for one year until Tom becomes of age.

At the end of six months, gossip develops into scandal. Bessie's position becomes serious and she writes Tom that he must acknowledge their marriage. Tom replies that his father is sending him to Europe for six months and begs her to guard their secret until his return.

The poor girl bears up as best she can and finds a confidant and champion in her pastor, who will hear no evil against her and defends her in the face of the most heartless accusations and persecutions. Her own uncle, a deacon of the church, with whom she lives, denounces her with others in open meeting at the church.

They demand her dismissal from membership and cast all sorts of imputations upon her. The old pastor will not see her cast out and destroyed; he will protect her. The congregation give him the choice of giving up his position of pastor or the espousal of the girl. He leaves the church and takes Bessie to his home. While they are awaiting, in want and self-denial, Tom's return from "abroad," Bessie becomes a mother. The minister who married Tom and Bessie has been called to fill the pulpit of the good old man who has so faithfully succored the helpless girl.

The scandal mongers are congratulating themselves on their righteousness when Tom returns, claims his wife and child, takes them before the church and faces their vilifiers, tells about his secret marriage to Bessie, is sustained by the pastor who performed the ceremony, demands an apology to Bessie and himself and then another for the dear old pastor who so nobly shielded the helpless and fatherless in the hour of need.

With the kindly acceptance of their regrets, the old pastor calls the attention of the congregation to the motto on the wall: "Charity Thinketh No Evil," then leads them in a prayer of gratitude for the blessings of charity which come to all who practice it.

THE FRUITS OF VENGEANCE.—There is an old saying that children's quarrels are like promises, easily forgotten. If the parents in this story had paid no attention to the quarrel which started its development into a near tragedy many a heart ache would have been avoided and much suffering prevented.

It was all on account of Phil, a mischievous young chap, taking an apple from Joe's little sister and the pummeling Joe gave Phil for his meanness. Phil runs home in tears to his mother. She awaits Joe's approach and gives him a good trouncing. Joe runs home and tells his mother; then the two women come to blows and a regular rough-and-tumble; this brings the husbands together in fisticuffs, and finally friends and neighbors are involved.

Shortly after these scenes a fire occurs accidentally in the barn of Joe's father, and Phil's father is arrested, falsely accused and convicted on circumstantial evidence. He is sentenced to jail as an incendiary.

After serving time for a year, he is released; with hatred in his heart he goes to the home of his enemy, determined to kill him. Stealthily he enters the house, pistol in hand, and is unexpectedly confronted by the little daughter of his enemy, who thinks he has come to pay a visit. She asks him to be seated, prepares some refreshments for him and treats him with such childish sincerity and kindness that he is completely unnerved.

She now calls her father, who is taken so unawares he can hardly believe his eyes when he recognizes his old antagonist, whose presence he denounces as an insult and bids him begone. The little girl calls the man back and pleads with her father to forgive and forget. The two men, through the influence of the little child, are led to a reconciliation and a happy ending of what might have been a real tragedy.

FROM SHADOW TO SUNSHINE.—Playing small parts and doing "extra" work at the theater, the heroine of this sketch struggles to support her sick mother and little sister. The mother engrosses her mind and attention to such an extent that she is detained at home, arrives at the theater late for rehearsal and receives notice of her dismissal from the company.

The leading man, a generous, whole-souled fellow, notices her weeping, asks the cause, and, learning the circumstances, comforts her and succeeds in getting the manager to reinstate her. After the performance he accompanies her home, buying necessaries and dainties for her mother on the way.

When he arrives at the poor girl's home, he finds her mother very sick, brings a physician who administers to her and is paid by the actor. Through their good friend's kindness they are enabled to tide over the days of want and place themselves in more comfortable circumstances.

Seven years later things are reversed; the benevolent and beneficent actor, through sickness, is now in want and incapacitated. He goes in search of a position and invariably is "turned down" or switched on the "we'll take your name and address" siding. He is discouraged and hopeless when a messenger enters with a call from a manager to come to the theater for rehearsal. He is so overjoyed, the excitement in his exhausted condition is too much for him, his heart is weak and he falls in a dead faint.

The messenger returns to the manager and reports the old actor's illness. While he is telling about it, the heroine, who is the leading woman and celebrated actress, Helen Dale, overhears the messenger and recognizes the name of her benefactor. She at once goes to his assistance. At first her old friend does not know her, gradually he calls her to mind, and when she tells him of her success he forgets for the time his own troubles in the enjoyment of her story.

In appreciation and gratitude of his past kindnesses to her she now provides for his immediate needs, and then takes him to her delightful home, where, in ease and comfort, he lives the remainder of his days.

ELEKTRA.—Agamemnon returns to Argos from the Siege of Troy, bringing, as a prisoner and trophy of war and victory, Cassandra, the beautiful daughter of King Priam of Troy.

Clytemenstra, the wife of Agamemnon, has a lover, Ægisthus, who fans the flames of jealousy aroused in Clymnestra by the arrival of Cassandra, with whom Agamemnon is very much infatuated. With caresses and expressions of admiration, Agamemnon is received by his wife and welcomed by his daughters—Elektra, Chrysothemis—and Orestes, his son.

His wife is on the point of following her children from the room when she beholds her husband anxiously looking out of the window and casting longing glances at the beautiful captive, Cassandra. The wife is confronted by her lover, who prompts her to kill her husband with the battleaxe which the King laid aside as he entered the room.

Spurred on and lashed into a jealous frenzy, the Queen kills her husband, and when Cassandra, who has seen the murder of Agamemnon through the window, rushes upon the scene, she, too, is killed by the infuriated Clytemnestra. Hearing the commotion, the King's children come into the room and, gazing upon the face of their dead father, are struck with horror.

Elektra is so shocked at the sight that she stands spellbound and speechless until her whole nature seems to change and assert itself in an overwhelming denunciation of her mother, calling upon her brother, Orestes, to make a vow to avenge the death of their father.

Clytemnestra marries her lover, Ægisthus. Elektra has lost her reason, possessed with vengeance and a hatred for her mother and her consort. Orestes has become a wanderer and adventurer. He causes a false report of his death to be carried to his mother, who rejoices at the news and freedom from the haunting thoughts of his return to avenge Agamemnon.

Years have passed and Orestes, now a young man, returns to Argos and meets Elektra, who does not know him. He compassionately caresses his unfortunate sister and gradually makes himself known to her; then she remembers all, and pleads with him to carry out his vow of retribution upon Ægisthus and his mother. Orestes assures her that is the object of his return. She tears up a stone from the courtyard and reveals the axe with which their father was killed.

Orestes seizes it and, rushing into the castle, kills his mother; then goes in search of her lover, whom he comes upon and pursues from hall to turret, through passageway and up winding staircase, and slays him just as he is about to leap from a window, through which Elektra, in the courtyard, beholds the scene with frenzied expressions of delight in the decree of the fates.

THE CONQUEROR.—Growing tired of the old farm, and filled with a desire to win his way in the world, young Jim leaves home and starts for the city, with the blessings and well wishes of his family, to accept a position which he has secured in a large factory.

After he is comfortably located in his new surroundings, he falls in with bad associates and gradually goes from bad to worse, writing lying letters home to his parents that he is meeting with advancement in his work and devoting his evenings to study. He is unfitted for his labors and loses his position, becomes dissipated and a homeless wreck.

He suddenly awakes to a sense of his own wretchedness and decides to return home and seek the shelter of his father's roof. He makes his way back to the old home. He creeps up to the open window and gazes into the familiar room where he said good-bye to the family only a few months before.

It is night. A neighbor is visiting them, and they are telling of their son's success and showing his letters of encouragement and assurance. The neighbor takes his leave. His old father and mother kiss his sister good-night and she retires while the old folks linger to read the Bible and pray for their son, Jim, who listens outside and hears them pray God's protection for his welfare.

Jim is overwhelmed with shame and remorse when he thinks of the lying and deceiving letters he has sent them, of his miserable condition and failure. He resolves, then and there, to go away again and make another fight to make good. He returns to the city; and this time, through saving the life of a little child, he secures employment and works his way up to a position of trust and responsibility.

He now decides to make a visit to the old folks at home. This time he appears a different man than when he made his first return as a tramp in the night. Now he is welcomed on his return with outstretched arms and loving embrace, and he tells with pride and joy of his success as a conqueror among men, conscious in his own mind of the blessed knowledge that has conquered himself and the world.

"IMP."

THE MISER'S DAUGHTER. Scrumpy old dad wants his sweet little daughter to marry a rotund old bachelor just because said "bach" will deliver some coin to dad for the favor. The young miss is telling her sweetheart all about the wish of her miserly father, and Romeo is raising an awful row about it, when dad appears and he beats an ignominious retreat, while the daughter goes into the house. Pretty soon she has the pleasure (?) of meeting the old skate her father wants her to marry, and doesn't she just jolly the life out of him! And the antique fool thinks he's getting a lovely reception, too. But the girl decides that she might just as well have some fun out of it, and she fastens onto him the unlovely domestic, who pesters him with her attentions until he is frantic.

This keeps up for awhile, but papa needs the money and wants the marriage of his daughter to come off soon. So the daughter decides to get off a prize stunt. She fixes it up that her sweetheart should masquerade as a clergyman. And officiate at her wedding? Bless you, no! That's all arranged. She tells the old gent that she's going to get dressed for the wedding, and soon he walks out smiling, a veiled lady on his arm. Straight toward the city they go, but, strange to say, they meet a minister as they are crossing a meadow. Sure he marries them right away; just when he places the ring on the bride's finger dad appears and receives his bundle of boodle, as per agreement.

Then our newly married friend, in order to kiss the bride, lifts her veil, and to his consternation the ugly servant girl, dressed in her mistress' suit, is beaming coquettishly at him. He immediately realizes that he is tricked, and attempts a getaway. But the homely damsel considers her luck too good to lose, and with arms like flails she seals his fate for him in no uncertain way.

HIS SECOND WIFE.—He is just the kind of a young man you would expect a lot of girls to love, but at this ball we see him dividing his attentions between two. They both seem to adore him, but finally, after a most diplomatic maneuvre, he gets a cosy corner with one and, to her surprise and delight, places a ring on her finger. The other girl sees the ring later, and resignedly congratulates both. Yes, she even attends the wedding; but one easily sees that she would not mind changing places with the bride.

A few years now pass. We see the erstwhile bride, now the mother of a pretty little girl, at home. But all has not been as happy as the wedding bells, for the mother's frail frame is being racked by coughs at frequent intervals; aye, it is that hacking, hollow cough which one immediately recognizes as the accompaniment of the great white plague. The father is distracted, but there is no recall from its grip, and we soon see the young mother abed; but before she closes her eyes she places the hand of her husband in that of her rival of former days, and admonishes the latter to care for her child. Then she sinks back, gone to her Maker.

The man has followed the wish with no qualms of conscience, for he likes his second wife well and all would be happy but for the fact that the child continually asks for her mother, talks of her, wants her, and is herself her living image. This makes it hard for the stepmother, who finally, unable to endure it, gets to hate the little one; and one day in a fit of passion she chokes the little one savagely. The child is old enough to understand, and writes a note, telling of the cruelty, and prepares to leave the shelter of her father's roof. But before she can do so, a dizziness overpowers her, she feels ill, and falls in a swoon. It is smallpox. We now see her in bed, a doctor and nurse in attendance. The note she has written, however, has brought the stepmother to a great realization, and the mother instinct in every woman asserts itself to such an extent that she defies contagion to nurse the child through her illness. Her sacrifice is rewarded, the little girl recovers, and with the father, the household is once again bathed in sunshine and happiness.

THE ROSARY.—A pretty model, two rival art students (her father's pupils) in love with her—a situation not at all surprising considering how alluring she looks in the garb of a nun, posing for their canvas. One of the young men, Edouard, is of comfortable circumstances, while Jean is a struggler in the clutches of want. But as Georgette watches them paint she observes that Jean is not even casting a glance at his model, but the ecstatic expression on his face shows that pure inspiration guides his brush.

When at last the artists have finished their tasks, Edouard is so aggravated by the superiority of his rival's canvas that he seizes an opportunity, when alone, to mutilate the painting with a knife, cutting and ripping it beyond restoration. Great is the sorrow of Jean when he discovers it, and Georgette is sympathetically embracing him when her father discovers them. In anger he orders his pupil from the house.

Jean sorrowfully goes to his attic room and hanging a rosary, Georgette has given him, on one corner of his easel, he proceeds to paint her with the head-piece for incentive. He finishes his task, and a marvelous work it is. With a loving caress of the easel, he saunters out into the fresh air. While he is gone the villainous Edouard enters, ostensibly to visit Jean. To his astonished gaze is revealed the second painting. He quickly realizes the significance of the fact that no model posed for it; choking with rage, hatred, jealousy the emotions render him almost insane—he draws a knife, cuts the canvas from its frame, and takes it away with him.

Poor Jean soon returns, and imagine his pain when he discovers what has occurred. But suddenly the divine inspiration that has given the world its Rembrandt, its Angelo and its Chopin seizes his soul, and with the rosary before his enraptured eyes, he draws his brush over his canvas again. It is the hand of the master, and soon we see an even more beautiful likeness of Georgette as a nun. And as he sits there, lost in contemplation, the marvelous eyes of the figure playing havoc with his aesthetic self, the door slowly opens and in steps Georgette! The surprise of both is unspeakable—his at her presence, hers at the wonderful painting, done without a model. She understands and asks him to bring the painting to her home.

A wealthy art collector has been asked by Georgette's father to inspect Edouard's painting, and we now see a party in the studio of the home. The curtain is raised and the connoisseur is examining it when Georgette steps forward and unfolds the story of Edouard's ignoble deeds. Aye, from under his own picture on the same easel she takes the mutilated work of Jean, and finally leads Jean himself from concealment. Modestly he acknowledges his last painting while Georgette tells how it was done; the collector buys the painting and Jean gets—well, he gets Georgette!

THE ACE OF HEARTS.—Down and out, "busted," up against it—that amply covers the situation of three young men who are borrowing tobacco leavings from each other. And it is here that the three form an agreement that seems to be inspired by the glumness of prospects. The man who draws the ace of hearts is to insure his life in favor of the other two. Then if, after two years, the other two have not prospered, he is to commit suicide, so that they would benefit thereby.

Destiny parts the trio, and Fred, who has drawn the ace of hearts, goes West, where he strikes it rich, and times get pretty good for him. As the rose must have its thorn, however, he meets with mishap. In trying to rescue a girl on a runaway horse he is struck on the head by a hoof. Taken to the girl's home, it is discovered that his mind is a total blank. But grateful for his daughter's rescue, the girl's father is caring for him tenderly. A long time has elapsed and his condition is still precarious. But one day he comes into the library as the girl is playing solitaire. He stands by the table, blankly looking on, when suddenly she turns up a card—it is the ace of hearts! For a moment he staggers—it has gone right to his brain—he has seen it before. The girl's parents are summoned by her cries, and they understand that his mental forces have been revived at last.

With the help of the doctor he is brought back to normal condition. But now that the world is once more bright for him, he is reminded that this is the day before the expiration of the two years. The agreement! His chums! He has not heard from them! He hastily draws a conclusion—he must commit suicide to-morrow. He sadly begins preparations to leave the roof that has sheltered him.

Meanwhile his two chums of former days have been a little fortunate, and have set out to find him. The trail finally leads them to the girl's home, and there they learn of his sudden disappearance. They do not give up hope, but heroically search on, until they hear of his having engaged a room in a boarding-house. To this place they hurry, and none too soon. The air is stifling from charcoal fumes, and they batter the door down just in time to prevent the execution of his part of the suicide compact.

BISON—

RED WING'S LOYALTY. An Indian Chief, whose luck is against him, loses his money to several Westerners, and finally leaves the tavern. He goes to a hiding place and, making certain there are no watchers, fills a bag with gold nuggets and returns to try his luck again. When he displays the gold much amazement is shown and an unscrupulous half breed decides to wrest the secret from the Chief by persuading him to drink. Red Wing, the Indian's daughter, enters and, seeing her father's condition, tries to get him away. The half breed, determined not to be thus foiled, throws Red Wing to the floor. A lieutenant has made his way into the tavern and, seeing the conflict, goes to Red Wing's aid. He protects her until she has passed out, following after himself, but first dropping his glove. Later the half breed follows the Chief and discovers the hiding place of the gold. By stratagem he ends the Indian's life and leaves beside him the lieutenant's glove. When the death is discovered, the half breed identifies the glove and the Indians intend seeking the owner. The lieutenant and a few followers are making their way across the prairie and set camp for the night. They are awakened by an Indian scout sneaking among them, whom they punish, which brings upon them the rest of the tribe. The half breed tells the lieutenant, whom they take prisoner. They then decide to end the lieutenant's life by burning him at the stake. Red Wing, upon learning who the victim is, dashes away to help him, as he did her. She goes to the soldiers' camp, apprises them of the danger and guides the captain and his men to the spot just in time, for the brush at the lieutenant's feet has been lighted. The Indians are vanquished and Red Wing repaid for her loyalty to the lieutenant.

ROMANCE OF A SNAKE CHARMER.—A pretty romance between an honest farm hand and the daughter of a snake hunter is disturbed by the arrival of some city folks. Gertrude shows her wonderful art of snake charming, and when her sweetheart offers to get a drink for one of the visitors, Jerome takes advantage of their solitude to flatter and make love to Gertrude. John sees this, but says nothing until the strangers depart, when he cautions the young girl against the wiles of the city man. A day or so later she receives a note from Jerome, promising marriage if she comes to him. John comes to visit her, and seeing the note, reads it; he tells her again of his great love and not to listen to the message in the note. Gertrude's father learns of the infatuation of the stranger and bids his daughter marry John, to which arrangement she is perfectly agreeable. One day, however, when Gertrude is some distance from home, she meets Jerome. He persuades her to go with him and she cannot resist the temptation. John and her father are greatly grieved over her weakness, and the latter says he will never forgive her. There is never any happiness for a country girl tempted from her home by an unscrupulous man, and so Gertrude learns. She is left alone and obliged to care for herself by turning to her snake charming. At one performance John is a spectator, and when he sees that a snake which has so tightly encircled her throat is crushing her, he dashes to her rescue, while the audience turns away in terror. When she revives John forgives and takes her home. The father will not relent until a wee child is brought to him, and then there is a general happy reunion.

ITALA—

THE VALUABLE HAT.—An elderly gentleman draws his money from the bank, which he deposits in his pocketbook. When it falls to the ground he decides to find another hiding place, and finally puts it in the lining of his hat. Seeing another man comfortably seated on a garden bench, he hastens to follow suit. Before long he is sleeping soundly and some mischievous urchins prepare to play a joke. They remove the hat from our old friend and then wake them both. Not finding his hat upon his head, the old man snatches that of the other. This causes a dispute, and when the mistake is discovered the old man in desperation goes further in search of his hat. All those who come in his path suffer at his hand, until finally he is shown that his own hat has been reposing on his back during his rampage.

AMBROSIO—

AN UNPLEASANT DREAM.—Thinking that he may be doing his sons an injustice, an old man sits in profound meditation. He has been told by a friend that the wisest course would be for the boys to go out into the world and seek their fortunes. It is hard to reconcile himself to this fact, as for many generations there have been no wanderers from the hearthstone. These thoughts are so firmly fixed in the old man's mind that when he falls asleep he dreams that his boys have gone home, each following a different path. Their experiences are many and perilous, and finally the older boy seeks refuge in a monastery, while the other lives on charity. The old man's joy knows no bounds when he wakes and finds it was but a dream.

LUX FILMS.

WASHED ASHORE.—Previous to his departure on a long sea voyage, an old sea captain, who is a widower, entrusts his child to the care of some fisher folk. This trust is, however, misplaced, for the couple turn their attention to spending the proceeds of this adoption in riotous living. After many miserable years of degradation the child manages to effect her escape, and while wandering in a weak, exhausted condition she encounters a gallant young orphan lad, with whom she lives for a short period. They live very happily together until one day they observe a strange object floating out at sea. This proves to be a man supported upon a life belt. The children rescue him, and, upon his recovery, the sailor sends for the guardians of his child. These people are summoned and tell their own story of how the child ran away from them. At this juncture the two children enter to see how their friend is progressing. The captain recognizes his little daughter and thus the false guardians are unmasked.

THE ATTACK UPON THE TRAIN.—The cowboys of Fenton's Quarry quarrel with a party of Mexicans, and during the scrimmage one of their number draws his revolver and shoots at the leader of the Mexican party. He is pursued by the police and finally captured. During his transit from the prison to the train he manages to arrange that his friends shall come to the rescue. This they determine to do, and it results in the express being held up. The cowboy is rescued, and accompanied by whoops and shots in the air the desperate ranchers ride back to the quarry to celebrate their victory.

THE POWERS COMPANY.

THE ACTRESS.—A young actress, Marion Gray, travelling with a theatrical company, enters a hotel and is insulted by a drunken loafer. "Dick" Corey, a young mining engineer, rescues Marion and punishes the ruffian who had annoyed her. Dick and Marion fall in love with each other. Six months pass. Marion is one of a gayly costumed group of actors waiting "behind the scenes" of a theater for the rise of the curtain. Davis, a wealthy "Johnnie," is introduced to Marion by her friend and room-mate, the Soubrette. Davis becomes infatuated with Marion, who remains faithful to Dick. Davis bribes the Soubrette to intercept the letters of the actress and her lover. Marion believes that Dick no longer cares for her and she finally consents to marry Davis. He goes out to get a minister to marry them. Dick enters. The girl forgets everything but that she loves Dick, and she agrees to marry him immediately. Davis returns with his minister. Then Dick is heard coming upstairs with another minister. Here is a situation! But the girl is equal to it. She persuades Davis and his minister to go into the adjoining room, and she locks the door. Dick enters with his minister, who marries the couple. Davis hears the minister pronounce the words that make Marion the wife of Dick, and he knocks on the door. Dick thinks Davis is a burglar. The girl makes the situation clear and the newly-wedded pair are at last left alone to enjoy their happiness.

A 29-CENT ROBBERY.—A marauder visits the home of little Edna Robinson, and is preparing to loot the house when he is frightened away by the entrance of the child. All he managed to take with him was Edna's toy bank, which contained the sum of 29 cents. But Edna grieves so bitterly about the loss of the bank that her parents decide to notify the police of the theft. "A 29-cent Robbery!"—it is to laugh!—and the police do. In fact, they laugh the parents out of police headquarters. When the parents tell the child about it she decides to see what she herself can do and call in person at headquarters. The captain is so fascinated by the child that he orders his officers to get busy on the case. They watch for a man carrying a toy bank, and make several arrests. Brought before Edna for identification, the suspects are pronounced guiltless by her and set free. Doubting the ability of the police to round up the right man, Edna secures a police whistle, and does some detective work on her own account. How good a sleuth she is the picture tells; and how good a picture it is we leave to you.

THE STRENGTH OF DUTY.—Vincent and Perdito are two brothers; the first an honest laborer and the second a wild young fellow, a lover of adventure, and who has become the leader of a gang which haunts the mountains near their peasant home. Upon returning from his labors one evening Vincent finds his mother in a swoon, and after arranging her comfortably upon the couch, rushes off to summon the doctor. Unfortunately, the doctor is not at home, but Vincent leaves a message asking that the doctor do not delay his visit to the old woman upon his return. He then hastens home to do all he can for his dear mother in the meantime. A little later the doctor returns from a fatiguing watch beside a suffering patient, but notwithstanding the fact that he is faint and weak with his day's work himself the good physician starts out to administer to Vincent's aged mother. The path the doctor must take to reach the peasants' cottage leads through a woods, down the mountain-side, and as he is hurrying on in the gathering dusk he is suddenly set upon by a band of footpads, robbed, and left unconscious. Meanwhile, the son, anxiously watching over his sick mother, becomes more and more nervous at the delay of the physician. He goes time and again to the door to listen for the welcome sound of footsteps—but in vain. At last he decides that he will calm himself by walking a short distance to meet the doctor, and before he has gone very far what is his surprise to come upon the prostrate form of a man! And how much greater his consternation when he recognizes the doctor whom he has been so eagerly expecting. Vincent helps the doctor, who is just recovering consciousness, to rise and offers to assist him to his home. But the good man will not hear of it; despite his own injuries and distress he insists on proceeding to the home of Vincent to do what he can for the suffering woman. Just as they are about to set off Vincent notices a hat upon the ground, and, picking it up, recognizes it as his own brother's. With a burst of grief and resentment Vincent informs the doctor that his assailant is his own brother, and the son of the woman for whom he has been willing to endure so much in order to aid. This news does not affect the good man's intentions, and leaning upon Vincent's arm he proceeds to the cottage and after arduous labor restores hope to the mother and son by pronouncing that the danger is over. At this moment the erring son enters, and seeing his mother lying ill rushes to her bedside, but the brother places himself between them and points toward the good doctor, denouncing his brother as a thief and would-be murderer. It is at this point that Perdito recognizes the doctor as his victim of the earlier evening, and when the full realization flashes upon him—that he might, through his crime have caused the death of his mother, beloved throughout all his waywardness he falls at the feet of the doctor, imploring forgiveness. The brother would have spurned him, but not so the good physician. He raises the young man from his feet, and places his hand within that of his brother, exhorting them both to love one another, and the younger one to return from his evil ways. Thus a soul is saved and love and happiness and health restored to a family—through the power of doing one's duty.

MADAME SANS GENE; or, "The Duchess of Danzig."—Opening in the lodgings of the Lieut. Buonaparte, then an impecunious young officer, the subject soon introduces us to Madame Sans Gene, who brings Napoleon his washing and submits to a kiss. Later, in the laundry itself, her rescue of Count Neupport, whom she assists in a wounded state to her own bedroom, is shown. The girl's lover, Sergeant Le Fevre, forces an entrance, but lets the prisoner go to shield his sweetheart. These scenes all contain much effective acting, as does a later one in which the sergeant is instrumental in saving Napoleon's life. The latter has taken the place of a sentry who has fallen asleep at his post and resting on the latter's rifle is waiting for him to wake, when a number of Royalist soldiers attack him. Le Fevre, on his rounds, comes to the rescue and secures a pardon for the sentry and promotion for himself.

Le Fevre's rise is rapid. Made a field-marshal, he, after the battle of Danzig, is made a duke for his gallantry in saving the colors. At this stage we are given another glimpse of the heroine, who follows her husband's fortunes in the camp. This period introduces some good scenes of camp life, the council of officers, etc.

Back at Paris, we find Napoleon in his private cabinet, unaware of an intrigue in progress in which the Empress is concerned, having for its object the escape of Count Neupport, who is entrusted with a letter to the Emperor of Austria. The Count, however, is discovered in the Court disguised, by Napoleon, and captured and condemned to death. Meanwhile, the Duchess of Danzig has visited Napoleon and laughingly shown him the unpaid laundry bill and the Little Corporal has shown that he is not insensible to her charms.

The Duke and Duchess hear of the capture of the Count and bring about his escape, the nobleman being conveyed through the lines in a military cloak and hat. Then they repair together to Napoleon and confess what they have done, to be magnanimously forgiven by the Emperor, after a natural outburst of anger, when he remembers that he owes his life to the man.

FRONTIER DAY IN THE WEST. To-morrow would be Frontier Day, and Nell Norton's white horse, the peerless Creto, had been entered as favorite. Charles Clayton was forced to admit to himself that if Creto ran, his horse, Gypsy, must be contented with second place. However, he had fully determined that Creto was not to run, and accordingly bet heavily on Gypsy. Common sense told him that any attempt to bribe the Norton's cowboys would only end in exposure, so, with the half-breed he hit upon the plan of drugging Nell's rider, Tim, who slept at the barn, and secreting the favorite until the race had been won. The haunted house would serve as a safe retreat; then, too, the road leading to it was so hard that no track would be seen. That night Clayton put his plan into execution, and the next morning dropped in carelessly to see how Nell was bearing her loss. She had summoned her father, likewise Lee Mason, her financee, and every cowboy on the ranch, to aid in the search, but, even so, Clayton went quite contentedly to the track, feeling absolutely sure that Creto would remain undiscovered until he chose to release him. And such might well have been the case had not the cowardly half-breed, in his mad efforts to get out of the haunted house, overlooked the blanket which the favorite rubbed from his back as he entered the door, for it was this blanket which led Nell and Lee, as they hurried down the road, to pause and search the premises. What was the girl's surprise and delight when she beheld her beloved pet. Hastily untying him, they hurried for the ranch, but, alas! Tim was still too weak to ride, and it was now only wanting a few minutes of two, when the race was to start. Creto would obey only his mistress or Tim, and in an instant Nell had decided to take the boy's place. Donning Tim's chaps, and hiding her hair under his large hat, she vaulted into the saddle and galloped off for the track. Nor was she a moment too soon, for, the Indian race, lariat-throwing and bucking contest being over, Judge Andrews had just bidden the boys line up for the race, when he beheld the white favorite and the supposed Tim dash up. Waving a light rebuke for the delay, he bade rider and horse take their place. They were off, and the white beauty, scenting the excitement in the air, and ever obedient to his young rider's coaxing, shot forward like an arrow. At the half-mile he was still in the lead, but Gypsy and the sorrel were creeping up alongside. With a cry of dismay, Nell touched his sides with her quirt, and brought him under the wire ere the others were half-way down the homestretch. As she dismounted, waving her hat, a mighty cheer went up from those nearby. They had heard of Tim being drugged, and they now recognized the rider as Miss Nell Norton. All rushed forward to offer their congratulations, and, although a heavy loser, even Clayton could not begrudge the girl the triumph she had so pluckily won.

PERSONAL NOTICE FROM CARL LAEMMLE

During the time I have been in the moving picture business thousands of men have written me declaring that they have implicit faith in my honesty of purpose. I have those letters on file. I now call upon the writers to PROVE their confidence in me by accepting without the faintest suspicion the HONEST intentions of the new Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company, just formed. This company is intended to be a BENEFIT to the whole independent cause—not merely to the manufacturers and exchanges. It will not be a money-making concern at all. It is intended to cement all the sincere Independent picture men into one powerful, irresistible amalgamation, run on strictly decent, square, honest lines. Don't think I have gone into it without the most searching investigation. Remember I am heart and soul in the fight for the Independent cause. Yes—heart, soul and bank account. I have spent money like water to give you the class of films you demanded and begged for. Don't think I am ass enough to jeopardize my standing in the business by any fool move. I tell you the new company is a Godsend to you and to me. Now is the time for you to show what stuff you're made of. Now is the time for every faint-hearted sister in the business to assert his manhood and make good on his promises of allegiance! The new sales company is going to give YOU the feeling of confidence and safety that the Alliance failed to inspire in some of you. Lies will be circulated about it. But never mind that. We have at last overcome the power of silly lies and bluffs. WE ARE TRIUMPHANT. And when I say "WE" I mean every exhibitor, every exchange and every manufacturer who is sincere in his Independence!

BISON BRINGS BUSINESS.

Exhibitors be on the jump and demand the "BISON" releases for the coming week. "Rivalry in the Oil Fields," Tuesday's release, is a sensational dramatic subject. This picture was taken in the California oil regions, much time and money having been spent in order to make it a subject of merit. Friday's "BISON" release, "Red Wing's Constancy," is the second subject of the "Red Wing" series about to be released by this company. We believe we have demonstrated our ability as producers of Western subjects and do not deem it necessary to go into detail concerning this picture, other than to say that the story is an exceedingly interesting one and the photography excellent.

Released Wednesday, April 13, 1910

At Double Cross Ranch

Length 998 Feet

A roaring farce-comedy of the West that puts everything you have ever seen in cowboy pictures 'way in the background, and is even better than the COWBOY PREACHER that we issued two weeks ago. It tells a story of an easterner who makes a trip to the west and his ideas of conditions there are based on what he has read in dime novels and seen in moving pictures. With that for a start in the hands of our stock company you can almost guess his finish.

Don't let your exchange "double cross" you on this top notcher, as some did on the COWBOY PREACHER, which is making us work overtime to fill belated orders.

LETTER FROM A LICENSED EXHIBITOR

I wish to the deuce I were at liberty to publish the name of the licensed exhibitor who wrote this letter. It would carry more conviction that way. But I am in honor bound not to do it. At the same time I want you to read these extracts:—"Dear Mr. Laemmle:—Again we wish to commend and bestow upon you the credit that is justly due you in your gallant fight for the Independent cause. You certainly are winning the respect and good will of all exhibitors and you deserve it. Your Mamma Ten Percent ads are a sledge hammer. Every exhibitor who is awake and up to snuff knows that they are true. Several exchanges tried to make a bluff that there was no such thing as the Ten Percent Penalty, but just the same the Ten Spot was figured in every time we changed to better our service. We are just in receipt of a letter from the Patents Co. that we must not run 101 Ranch, Nelson & Wolgast or Military Tournament films. SAY, IF IT WERE NOT FOR THE INDEPENDENTS WOULDN'T THE PATENTS CO. SCALP THINGS! We are only waiting for the INDEPENDENT MANUFACTURERS to turn out two or three more reels per week and then we'll be with you. Until then we've got to stick to trust goods. Use this letter if you like, but for vital reasons cut out our names." There's meat in that letter for you, Mr. Exhibitor. Read it again! Then slip me a note.

The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company

Combination or co-operation between the members of any industry for mutual benefit is always worthy of encouragement, provided that equity be recognized as a first and fundamental principle of the organization. Rather more than a year ago, following the formation of the Motion Picture Patents Company, a movement was started by Mr. J. J. Murdock and other gentlemen for the purpose of giving the Independent exchanges an adequate supply of film that would enable them to furnish the Independent exhibitor with a regular weekly program. Notwithstanding the fact that the situation created by the Patents Company presented a clear and well defined field to the Independents, it is a matter of history that the International Company did not succeed. More recently there was a similar but equally abortive attempt on the part of the Film Import and Trading Company, whose declared aim was to control the Independent field, as between manufacturers, importers and renters. At one time it appeared as if the Film Import and Trading Company was within a measurable distance of success, but the skyrocket rise and fall of that company and its promoter, C. M. Freeman, is also a sad page in the history of the moving picture from the standpoint of the Independents.

Now we have in sight a third attempt at consolidation of interests, which so far seems to have met with much opposition. The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company is avowedly a combination of two Independent manufacturers and is ostensibly designed to facilitate the sale of all pictures of Independent manufacture, maintain a standard of quality and govern the distribution—in other words, a commercial organization such as is operated successfully in other lines of business. The National Independent Alliance, which is still a factor in the field, may be said to have had this opportunity, but being a deliberative instead of a commercial organization, its power was limited, and it may also be said that its weakness lay in its strength of numbers. The promoters of the Sales Company give this as their reason for limiting the personnel of that organization to members of but two of the many manufacturing concerns in the Independent field.

There is one plank in the program of the proposed Sales Company that meets with our approval, and that is their proposal to have a committee of the various manufacturers act as censors of quality. It is declared essential that participation in the services of the Sales Company means the production of good moving pictures. So far, so good. For years we have preached the doctrine of good quality to both Licensed and Independent manufacturers, and our preaching has not been without effect. We were the first, we were the only publication to insist upon the prime importance of good quality pictures. And this is why we like the proposal of the Sales Company that the manufacturers censor each other's pictures and that they be not marketed unless they reach a certain definite standard of quality.

With regard to the constitutional details of the Sales Company, we have nothing to say, as we have not been permitted to read the articles of agreement. What we have said and may say in its favor is based on the verbal assertions of its promoters. We have the personal assurance of Mr. Thomas D. Cochrane, its general manager, and for whom we have a very high regard, that the Sales Company will be administered for the benefit of the moving picture business as a whole; that there will be no aggrandizement of any one particular manufacturer or importer to the detriment of his competitors; that the sales will be regulated by the demand and every manufacturer will have a fair show. To quote Mr. Cochrane: "The proposition is strictly on the level." If so, and the other manufacturers can be made to see it in the same light and pool their interests under one-man or unit control, they will only be following the example of the Licensed manufacturers.

There is another aspect in which this combination earns our praise, and that is because each of its promoters say that it is designed primarily for the safeguard of the manufacturer and essentially for the advantage of the renter and exhibitor. The Independent renters and exhibitors have had a rather rough time of it of late, because, as they have complained to us over and over again, they have been unable to get enough good pictures. It is the aim of the Sales Company not only to guarantee the quality but to guarantee a regular release of sufficient quantity to maintain a healthy business condition. Heretofore the exchange man has been uncertain as to whether he would get a shipment from one or other concern next week and he was afraid to take on customers and exhibitors were afraid to make investments. But with the combined product in the control of a strong commercial organization, and its distribution in the hands of a competent manager, the Independents would be well on the way of obtaining a very big slice of the moving picture business of the United States.

We have said "a commercial organization" advisedly, for it seems that there is more than one in the air, although so far there is only one on paper. Another group of Independent manufacturers are busy drawing up a plan for a holding company in which all manufacturers and exchanges shall share alike, or in proportion to their investment, after the operating expenses have been deducted. Their plan is to place the management of the sales and distribution in the hands of a man who has no affiliation with any manufacturer represented in the combination, he to work under the directorship of a board of three to be elected at open meeting. Every three months one director is to be retired and another elected to take his place. Many excellent arguments could be adduced in favor of a combination working along these lines, but that is not our sphere. We merely cite the fact to show that at present there is no unanimity of action, if there be unanimity of purpose. Of course, complete unanimity would have been better for the Independent business as a whole and certainly for the Sales Company as a unit, but whether it is unanimously supported or not, it seems destined to go on, for, as one of the promoters rather irreverently put it, when we asked if anyone else could buy stock in the Sales Company and what they would do if the other manufacturers would not affiliate. He replied: "There is no stock for sale; we will go on in spite of opposition, and no power in heaven above or earth beneath can break up the combination!"

So, accepting as sincere the assurances given us that there is no personal ambition to foster and no joker in the sales agreement, no carefully designed attempt on the part of what is termed by their opponents as "the Fourteenth street bunch" to freeze out or squeeze out competitors, we think that the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company is a more intelligent attempt than any of its predecessors. We even go as far as to say that it is the most adroit attempt that has yet been made to control the Independent side of the moving picture business.

There must be, and there always will be, an Independent side to this business. No sane person has ever even dreamed of monopolizing it. Monopoly is out of the question. Sybaritical utterances about trusts and monopolists make us and every sensible onlooker of the game laugh outright. Vapid references to Standard Oil and Mr. Rockefeller by illiterate journalists make us think that the fool-killer is shirking his duties. Anybody who thinks the matter out closely and intelligently will see for himself that it is a practical impossibility to form a monopoly in the moving picture field. Consequently we say that there always must and always will be an Independent side. But there is no business more amenable to regulation—in other words, there is no business that is more endangered by what is known as the open market. Beware of the Pharisee who, from ignorance or design, assiduously advocates the open market. A strong commercial organization on the one side has already worked wonders in safeguarding and elevating the business. So let the other side come forward with their combination on equally well defined and equitable lines and work along a parallel course for mutual benefit and general advancement.

But—LET THERE BE HARMONY. If it is to be the Sales Company, why not fall in step and give the leaders a chance to make good their promises? If the majority vote of the present vested interests in the Independent manufacturing field is against this combination, then wherein lies their right to assume the role of dictator?

The Music and the Picture

The other night as we sat in the Parkway Theater, Central Park West, New York City, watching the pictures and listening to the excellent pianoforte music that accompanied them, there passed through our minds the reflections that we are embodying in this article. We have said the same thing before, but we have no hesitation in repeating ourselves, in asking moving picture exhibitors or pianists or those responsible for the music to fit the music to the picture. We will develop this point.

Turning over an old number of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, we find that about eight or nine months ago we visited a Brooklyn theater only to hear, "I Dreamt That I Dwelt in Marble Halls" played, whilst a Biblical subject was being shown on the screen! This, we pointed out, was an anachronism. Anachronisms and absurdities are shown so much in the moving picture field, that if we were to enumerate them all, we should take up too much of our space and run the risk of hearing the accusation that we have heard before: that we are just knockers. Of course, this is absurd. We are critical, and perhaps severely so, but it is in the interests of the moving picture first of all, and then of ourselves in the second place, because our prosperity is bound up in the prosperity of the moving picture.

This question of suitable music for the moving picture is one that should be handled from the purely scientific aspect. Just as Wagner fitted his music to the emotions, expressed by words in his operas, so in course of time, no doubt, the same thing will be done with regard to the moving picture. The Edison Company and others have issued instructions in their bulletins for the kind of music to accompany their pictures, but from our slight knowledge of the subject we can perceive that this is only one step, and that a preliminary step, towards the provision of proper music for the moving picture.

In another article in this week's WORLD we point out briefly that the moving picture, in one of its aspects, is merely a series of light sensations. That is true. But also, in the acting end of the picture, we have represented, more or less effectively, a series of human emotions. The "Imp" Company just now are profiting by the signal success of Miss Lawrence in their pictures. They have issued photographs of this lady, showing a rather good command of facial expression in the rendering of emotion. The lady seems to think before our eyes, and to actually feel the emotions she is portraying.

Feature Films for Feature Music

While it would show unpardonable egotism on our part, nevertheless it would make interesting reading to the few sceptics who have not yet realized that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD is a power for good in its field, if we were to print the many letters of commendation and thanks we have received from exhibitors who have profited by our precepts. Among several received this week is one from the Orpheum Theater, Chicago, which we select for comment because it touches upon a subject which is dealt with in this number—the music to suit the picture.

The Orpheum, an altogether well conducted and exemplary theater, regales its audiences with music by a highly efficient orchestra. But, what is more to the point, the leader of this orchestra, Mr. William E. King, takes especial pains to suit the nuances of his music to the scenes and to the character of the picture. Our Chicago representative, Mr. Bradlet, has taken a special interest in the Orpheum, and it is largely through his encouragement that suitable music has been adopted in this and other theaters that he has visited. What more congruous, then, than he should see in a coming release a theme specially adapted for appropriate music of a high class? Favored by Mr. George Kleine with an advance view of the Gaumont film, "A Penitent of Florence," or Gloria in Excelsis, Mr. Bradlet realized how the masterful production could be rendered even still more impressive by a suitable musical accompaniment. So he immediately interviewed the manager of the Orpheum, Mr. Levine, and requested him to allow his orchestra leader to prepare special music for the picture. Mr. Kleine kindly consented to a second exhibition of the film and approved the idea of the special music, and as a result we find "The Penitent of Florence" advertised in his bulletin for release April 19th with a special musical program by Mr. William E. King, that, if followed by the musical conductors of other theaters, will make the number the headliner of the day, to say the least, and a treat to be long remembered. The story in itself is clear, full of dramatic merit, and has a strong climax and a happy ending. With the excellent Gaumont photography, what more could an exhibitor want? and we hope every one will secure the film and make the most of it by following the excellent musical program which we will print next week with the story of the film.

While on this subject we also wish to draw attention to another film, which, if presented with appropriate music, will also create a great sensation. It is "The Old Fiddler," an emotional sketch that will be released by the Kalem Company on April 13th. Briefly, the story treats of an old man who feels he is in the way, as his daughter-in-law rudely objects to his fiddling while she attends to her household duties. So the old man slips out at night and leaves a note that he has gone to make his living by his fiddle. On discovering this, the son upbraids his wife and starts out to seek his father. Following several clues, he at last hears the familiar strains of the violin in the distance and lovingly brings his father home to the now thoroughly repentant wife. It will be a hard-hearted person indeed who can look upon this picture without shedding a tear, and if it is presented with the strains of a violin following the movements of the old fiddler, and, at the end of the search, if a gradual crescendo is effected to denote the approach to the fiddler, the illusion will be complete and will captivate any audience.

This simple touch of real life is so unlike the average Kalem story, the characters are so well suited to their parts, and the action is so well sustained and so perfectly natural that we can only say they have set up for themselves in this film a very high standard indeed that will take some effort—and then some—to live up to.

Not a "Fad"

We were reading on Sunday last a very able article in the New York "Times" on the social geography of the East Side, by Professor W. E. Laegerquest, of Cornell. Probably no more well judged analysis of the social conditions of New York's poorer section has recently been published. In the course of the article the learned professor analyzes the amusements of the New York Ghetto and delivers himself of the following: "One of the recent growths in amusement has been the penny arcade and five-cent vaudeville. There are seven penny arcades and twenty-eight moving picture shows in the district (1908). No doubt this fad, as all other fads of the American, will soon grow old."

We have nothing to do with the penny arcades, but we certainly have something to do with the moving picture, and we are rather sorry to see the idea take root in the mind of a scientific man that the moving picture is a fad, i. e., that its popularity with the public is likely to pass away at any moment. If Professor Laegerquest will kindly turn to the last number of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and see what we have to say about Kleine's catalogue of moving pictures we believe that he will come to the conclusion that the moving picture is no more a fad than is the illustrated book, the telescope, the microscope, the photographic camera, but that it has firmly established itself as a part of the scheme of life of the great American people. A fad hardly supports twenty thriving manufacturers, who are, it seems, without exception, adding to their manufacturing space; a fad hardly supports some hundreds of renters, some thousands of employees and some thousands of theaters, not to mention throughout the world something like twenty different publications devoted to the moving picture.

What we regard as "fads" are such things as ping-pong, diabolo, roller skating, and certain phases of sport, entertainment, personal mannerisms and habits. Anybody looking back over the last ten years will know what we mean. The whole community seems seized with some sudden impulse to a kind of mild frivolity. At one time society people made a fad of the bicycle. But with them the bicycle is as dead as a doornail. Then a fad of decadence broke out in the theaters. The light-hearted and practical American people soon gave that fad its quietus. It is hard to say what the amusement future of the moving picture will be. It is rather in the evolutionary stage, but as to its educational, scientific, industrial, scenic, geographic and other uses, why, these are simply necessities of life. We hope the distinguished professor will procure a copy of Mr. Kleine's catalogue, to which we referred last week, and then we are convinced he will no longer regard moving pictures as a "fad."

"Teddy" Roosevelt's visit to Rome last week caused enough talk and newspaper comment to arouse the world. The moving picture reproductions of the ex-President's visit to Africa are to be placed on exhibition Monday, April 18, and the notoriety attending the traveler's visit to Rome should serve as a good advertisement for them.

MOVING PICTURES OR MOVING PHOTOGRAPHS.

By Thomas Bedding, F.R.P.S.

The fact that my friend, Mr. Pat Powers, advertises picture plays, started me in a train of thought which I will deliver myself of on this page, because I may get some of my readers to think as I think on the subject, and therefore absorb a number of progressive ideas. What do we expect to see when we go to a moving picture house, a moving picture or a moving photograph? Note the distinction and the difference that I make, both here and in the title of the article, a distinction and a difference between the picture and the photograph. Are we aiming to produce and exploit pictures or photographs? For it may be remarked that, while a picture is not, and need not necessarily be, a photograph, a photograph can be a picture. Pictures are of many kinds. There are engravings, lithographs, paintings, etchings; the classifiers place photography and photographs in a class by it and themselves. They draw the distinction and the difference, and practically say that a photograph is not and cannot be a picture.

But it can be, as anybody who, like myself, has followed the development of pictorial photography these last twenty years very well knows. Are our photographs pictorial? If so, let us call them pictures. I do not think that they are pictorial, except in a very few instances. Let me briefly say what I mean by pictorial. I mean that the making of the pictures is subjected to certain definite laws of composition, grouping, lighting and selection, and that being rendered into monochrome, or, in other words, as in the case of the photograph, developed, the lights and shades, the tones, the contrast, the scale of gradation of a picture are accurate to nature.

Let the reader, who takes as deep an interest in the picture as I do, commit this formula to memory when next he is looking at the moving photograph and ask himself whether that photograph complies with his ideas of this formula. He will be surprised how very few photographs on the screen come anywhere near this definition of the pictorial. They are just photographs, moving photographs, just camera snaps, the moving equivalent of the stationary snapshot, haphazard in every essential respect.

In stationary photography nobody pretends that a snapshot is anything but what it is. Nobody calls it a picture. For the moment you come to criticise it, in 99 cases out of 100 it falls down in respect of those qualities which go to make a picture and which I have enumerated above.

Can the intelligent reader see the distinction which I am drawing between the moving picture and the moving photograph? Moving pictures are made, but they are vastly inferior in point of numbers to the moving photograph. Let me, by way of a purely personal observation, tell the reader what I think moving pictures are like. They are like those produced by Messrs. Gaumont, the Urban-Eclipse, and very occasionally by some of the other makers. To the ordinary moving picture theater visitor, Gaumont or Urban pictures have an indefinable "something" which they like, appreciate and enjoy, but do not understand. I have noticed this over and over again. This simply arises from an unconscious esthetic appreciation of a well composed, accurately lighted, accurately exposed and developed photographs. In other words, these pictures are pictorial. They are not haphazard photographs or snaps of an imperfectly arranged subject. An artist has arranged, composed or chosen the theme, a skilful technician has developed them, whilst, in the latter case, that of the black or white photograph, the clever photographer, that is to say, a clever workman, has produced the result.

I want everybody who reads this article to do me the justice of trying to understand it, and to see the distinction that I am drawing between pictorial moving picture making and snapshot moving picture making. There is a vast difference between the two. Before me as I write are several of the photographic magazines. In these publications are some nice technical photographs produced by clever photographers, which at first sight look like etchings, engravings or reproductions of paintings by well-known artists. And they are pictorial.

In emphasizing this difference, therefore, between the pictorial moving picture and the ordinary moving picture, I trust that I may be instrumental in getting many of my readers to look for something more pictorial on the moving picture screen than they see in the majority of cases. I have said more than once that many of the manufacturers have hardly yet commenced to make pictures. They are making photographs of a kind. But they are not making pictures, as any man of art training—I hold a certificate, by the way, for art knowledge—very well knows. In making this distinction between the making of moving pictures and moving photographs, I have drawn down upon my head the jeers of the ignorant and illiterate fool who does not know the difference between a picture and a photograph or a horoscope and a device for cheating the public. Be that as it may, I conclude by saying that exactly this time last year, I was publishing in the World a series of articles on "The Modern Way of Moving Picture Making" which might, I think, be read with profit by those manufacturers and their help who have come into the field since those articles were written. For they and others who will read those articles may take a step nearer the time to which I am looking forward, namely, when the moving photograph will be a moving picture.

There is a certain class of moving picture house, perhaps the most objectionable feature we know of, and that is the moving picture theater which is part and parcel of a saloon or is run as an adjunct to the saloon. As long as we have so many of this class, it would seem to be more or less a hopeless task to set the public mind at ease in regard to the moving picture as a safe and wholesome place of amusement for young and old. And to divorce the two interests will be no easy task in some of our cities, but we believe a way will be found to do it, and when it is done it will be done, we believe, by the right thinking men among the moving picture exhibitors who desire to rid the business of everything objectionable and who believe it is worthy of a permanent place among the amusement enterprises of our time.

The New York Sunday "American" recently instituted a moving picture feature in its City Life Section. The first article appeared on March 27 and is by Kate Carew, who visited scenes in the bewildering wonderland of the "silent drama." The authoress treats her subject in a very informative manner. We especially applaud the opening paragraph of the first article, which shows us that she has the interests of the children at heart. The second article, which, like the first, is illustrated with sketches, deals with prominent features of the work. It is the intention of the New York "American" to treat the subject week by week from the popular standpoint. A paper with the enormous circulation of the Sunday "American" is bound to have a beneficial influence on the moving picture business and we welcome its co-operation.

Music and Motion Pictures.

By S. L. Rothapfel.

The very first thing for the careful manager to do in this department is to get a good musician. I agree that the cost is sometimes large, and you may think, too, that you cannot afford it, but just give it a trial and see for yourself how much better your performance will be, how much better your average will loom up, and the very thing that you were afraid would be an extravagance will turn out to be the best investment you ever made. It is absolutely impossible to accomplish anything with a musician who has no ability; it is like trying to sweep without a broom.

As most places use a pianist, it is not very difficult to obtain almost anything in music for motion pictures. First of all, the pianist for a motion picture theater should be a good "faker" and an excellent reader. If he or she is not, the manager should insist that they become proficient in these two things, as without them they can never be successful pianists for motion pictures. They should have a good repertoire of the classics, semi-classics, patriotic and popular selections, and should be careful to learn the national airs of the different countries; they should be able to render, instantly, incidental music, being able to swing from one selection to another without any pause or hesitancy. This may seem very hard, but I assure you it is not, and only requires a little practice, and will make the work all the more enjoyable.

What to play I cannot tell you here, as it would consume too much space, but almost any of the heavy classics will do for a good dramatic subject, interspersing now and then with incidental music as the occasion demands. For comedies, good lively marches, or popular songs, will be found adequate. For patriotic pictures, patriotic music, but be sure you have the right country. I once heard a pianist playing "Dixie" for a heavy battle scene which was laid in a foreign country, and the participants were, I believe, the French and Germans; and she played it right along through everything, and the drum was right on the job with her, through death and pathos, love and jealousy. Can you imagine the effect? This may be rather rare, but I assure you in a great many theaters to-day the conditions are the same. Pianists must remember that they are merely one of the cogs in the wheel that makes the picture theater go round, and as a rule the people pay to see the pictures, not to hear the pianist, so therefore play softly when occasion demands and always remember the picture comes first.

Mr. Frelinger, of Indiana, issues a book of incidentals which will help a great many pianists, and by getting this book they will be able to get a very good idea of what is meant by incidental music, but they must also be careful not to use the same thing over and over again. Mr. Frelinger's idea is that it is merely a guide, and any fair pianist will be able to fake around these little bars and obtain variety, and yet maintain the effect. The Edison Company issue with every copy of their Kinetogram a carefully arranged score for every one of their pictures, and by following closely a very good idea can be had of what is meant by arranging music to suit every scene and every action in a motion picture.

Our friend Will G. Barker writes us that he has completed the new offices and works of the Barker Motion Photography, Ltd. The works are situated in the outskirts of London. The offices are in Topical House, Soho Square. "Locals," that is "topical," pictures are Barker's specialties, and we are promised new developments in the combination of the talking and motion picture. We wish Mr. Barker every success in his new enterprise.

The Moral Development of the Silent Drama.

By Frank L. Dyer, in the "Kinetogram."

There should be no difference of opinion between honest and clean-minded men on the subject of morality, either in a general sense or in its aplication to special conditions such as the moving picture art. All of us at least ought to know what is right and what is wrong. The moving picture manufacturers should realize, and I believe all of the licensed manufacturers do realize, that the present interest in the silent drama is not a mere passing, ephemeral craze. It contains too many possibilities for good and enlightenment to be regarded in any other sense than as a permanent and dignified form of amusement. It makes its appeal largely to women and to young people, and it keeps many a man from the saloon.

A film manufacturer who would attempt to appeal to his audience by putting out a picture in any way suggestive or seeking to arouse interest by an appeal to the brute instincts of his audience is as misguided as the man who would tell a questionable story in a company of ladies and gentlemen. He makes no appeal to either sex; the ladies are shocked and the men pity him for a fool. Certainly a salacious or brutal or criminal scene depicted by a moving picture can make no appeal to the innocent-minded, and, while there may be men who perhaps would view such pictures with apparent pleasure, I doubt very much if they really do. From a purely material sense, therefore, a film manufacturer, in my opinion, would make a serious mistake in putting out a picture with the deliberate purpose of pandering to a depraved or erotic taste. I do not believe, however, speaking for the licensed manufacturers, that the material side of the question is so important as is the idea that they have allied themselves with a great movement that is designed in the future to have a substantial effect on the views and character of our people. They feel in a sense as the publishers of high-class magazines, books and newspapers must feel—that their wares, to make a lasting appeal, must find a response in the finer sense of their audiences and not otherwise.

One very great handicap under which the licensed manufacturers have labored is the fact that the moving picture business has developed with tremendous strides and the character of the audiences has apparently improved to a corresponding extent. It has been difficult to meet the demand, and in the rush and pressure, no doubt, there have been isolated cases of scenes or instances which sober second thought would probably have omitted; but these cases are rare and they are becoming rarer. The producing men, I think, without exception, appreciate the character of the appeal which is to be made and they realize the ultimate development of the art to a position of dignity and importance. When the works of Dickens and Victor Hugo, the poems of Browning, the plays of Shakespeare and stories from the Bible are used as a basis for moving pictures, no fair-minded man can deny that the art is being developed along the right lines. There probably always will be sporadic cases of films based on instances that are unduly brutal or suggestive, but the business as a whole should not be condemned for this reason any more than should the stage be condemned because salacious and immoral plays have been presented, or that the drama should be condemned because some of the works of Ibsen and Bernard Shaw have been based on immoral and suggestive themes.

I have heard so much of late regarding the stringency of the Department of Water, Gas and Electricity of New York City with regard to the qualifications of moving picture machine operators that I decided the other day to investigate and see for myself if the department is as exacting as reported. I am able to report that the Department is on the job and applicants for licenses are receiving the hardest examination the board has enforced since the licensing of picture machine operators was first enforced. In 1909 there were about 1,400 licensed operators in Greater New York. Of this number about 900 have been examined for renewals of cards and up to last Monday 364 renewals had been granted, while more than 450 applicants were rejected. I asked a well-known operator yesterday if there was any particular reason for the slow progress made in examining the applicants and the large percentage of rejections. He replied that the slow progress was due to the attention given the examinations. Any operator who succeeds in getting the department's endorsement now may be relied upon. The examinations are rigid and bona fide. I do not wish to convey the impression that previous examinations were fakes. What I do mean is that the present examinations are more technical, go deeper into details, and are devoid of any traps or tricks. It is a well-known fact that in former years the department's examining board resorted to various means to run the applicant up against trouble purposely created to make him search and locate the source. It was frequently claimed that these tactics were carried a little too far at times and were unfair to a great extent. It was also claimed that many worthy applicants failed to pass examination on account of some of these traps. However, conditions are changed and the applicant now has placed before him an apparatus that is in no way "fixed," and he is given the same opportunity to demonstrate his ability as he is given when he enters a place to give a show. I have not taken the examination, but from the expressions of nervousness and uncertainty on the part of some operators I know who are about to take, or have taken the examination, I am convinced that an operator must know something more than he can glean from a correspondence course. If the present rule is kept in force there is no disputing the assertion that the theoretical operator is a thing of the past and the man who gets a card is one of experience.

I also took the trouble to inquire as to how the operators' union took the current developments and the information I gleaned from one who is looked upon as an authority on such matters shows that the union takes the situation very philosophically. My informant stated that it is generally known that, in spite of the enormous increase in the number of moving picture places the number of operators has far exceeded the demand. If in this great number there are operators who are not qualified to be termed such the union is bound to submit with all due grace to the decision of any board that is qualified to determine the question and does so in a fair and legitimate manner. It is not the province of the union to espouse the cause of anyone who is not qualified, and furthermore the pruning of unqualified operators by a competent board of examiners is really to the advantage of the union and its qualified members in many respects that are quite obvious.

* * *

Thinking of the operators recalls to my mind an ordinance that is before the Board of Aldermen of Greater New York. It provides that no person shall operate a moving picture projecting machine until he has been examined and licensed by the electrical board of the Department of Water, Gas and Electricity. It also provides that the manager of the place of exhibition will be held to equal accountability for violation of the ordinance; that is, before employing an operator the manager must first satisfy himself that the applicant has been duly examined and licensed. The penalty for violation of the proposed ordinance is $100 fine, or three months' imprisonment, or both.

If the bill gets to a vote of the Board of Aldermen it will get there only after a hard fight. I understand some exhibitors are opposing it because they do not wish to be saddled with any responsibility as to the licensing of an operator. Some of them claim that they can be very easily imposed upon by an operator securing a position on a card borrowed from a friend. This contention, however, does not carry weight with it. In the first place, it is not probable that a manager would be subjected to the penalty if he can show that he acted in good faith and the operator secured the position by fraud. In the second place, operators know too well what will happen to them if they lend a card to another who has no card and is not entitled to one, and if the proposed ordinance is enacted every case in which an operator may lend his card to another will surely be detected. None will know at what hour of day or night an inspector will drop into a picture place and ask the operator to produce his card and show he is qualified to operate the machine.

The Summer season at Coney Island is slowly coming to life—that is, the moving picture end of it. A number of places are now running on Sundays and some of them also run on Saturdays. In about five weeks hence all the Island will be active and the picture shows will be in daily operation. I visited the Island last Sunday and found the picture places well patronized considering the time of the season. It seems to be nip and tuck between the picture men and the frankfurter vendors as to who gets on the ground first, but the former wins out because there are a few places on the Island that run pictures the year round.

Reports from the West state that local authorities in various places have started a crusade against moving pictures that are not censored before being placed on exhibition. In some places laws have been passed making such exhibitions misdemeanors and the renting exchanges have become badly frightened. There is no occasion for alarm. The authorities referred to have stated that they will recognize the censorship of the National Board of Censors. All they want is some evidence that this Board has passed on the films, and this, I understand, is being looked after by the proper parties. In one or two instances, reports state, the local authorities insist upon a local censorship as well as the other. In my opinion, this is going a little too far. Local administrations of this character are frequently prejudiced, or so tight-laced, as to bar conservative sentiment. The calibre of the National Board of Censors is such that its approval of a subject may be accepted with safety by any community. I will admit that in a few instances recently subjects approved have occasioned comment, but upon looking into the matter I have received explanations that satisfied me. One explanation given is that to eliminate all suggestion of unlawfulness or crime would not only wholly destroy some subjects, but also wipe out the moral sought to be conveyed. To properly present a moral it is frequently necessary to depict or subject a crime or act of unlawfulness. Take, for instance, one of the recently issued series of biblical pictures. One scene shows the intended slaughter of an infant as a test to determine which of two women claimants was the mother of the child. The scene is one of the most striking of the story and the incident could not be told in any other way.

The same latitude granted the censorship of biblical subjects should be accorded the others. This could be conceded with safety. It is a certainty that this latitude would not be exercised to its full extent. There are some incidents in biblical stories that would kill a modern story. No manufacturer would use them. Pictures that are intended to make a hero of a villain or convict, or uphold some unlawful act will never pass the National Board of Censors. To say that the portrayal of a crime in a picture tends to lead children and weak-minded people to commit similar acts is all rot when it is remembered that such portrayals are followed by a moral showing the inevitable penalty that is paid by people who commit such acts. Give the pictures a fair show. Don't dig into their vitals to try and find something suggesting evil.

THE MOTION PICTURE DISTRIBUTING AND SALES COMPANY.

Its Object and Aims Outlined by Its President.

Carl Laemmle, the president of the newly organized Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, has issued the following statement regarding its platform:

"First and foremost, the object of the new company is to solidify all the Independents—the exhibitors, the exchanges and the manufacturers.

"Second, it is distinctly not a money-making company, but a plan which will enable the Independents to act as a unit, promptly, effectively and backed by every man who has the good of the Independent movement at heart.

"Third, it will most assuredly not pose as a dictator, but rather as a clearing house—a central agency which will be held responsible for and to the Independents.

"This company is the result of weeks and months of serious discussions. It is a sort of evolution, containing the best ideas of many which were submitted with a view toward making the whole Independent movement so powerful that any and all exhibitors and exchanges desirous of asserting their independence can do so without that vague and indefinite fear which has held some of them back in the past.

"The only objection raised by anyone against the new company has been the assertion that it might be mistaken for an 'Independent Trust.' This argument falls of its own weakness for the reason that the very men who now constitute the backbone of the Independent movement—the exhibitors and the exchanges and the manufacturers—are men who have shown by their actions that they will not stand for the yoke, men who have defied oppression at the risk of their fortunes and welfare.

"The new company will be conducted with absolute candor and openness. Every man who has a question to ask concerning the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company is herewith advised to present it immediately. We will compile a list of all such queries and answer them publicly.

"The Independent manufacturers will sell their product directly to the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company. The latter will deal directly with the exchanges. Thus the exchanges, instead of transacting business with a large number of different houses, will have the one central company to deal with. We have figured that this feature alone will eliminate thousands of dollars of waste, not only for the manufacturers, but for the exchanges.

"One of the duties of the new company will be to investigate the eligibility of such new exchanges as may apply for independent films. We have found that the opposition has set up so-called independent exchanges for the probable object of hurting genuine independent exchanges already in existence. The Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company will see that every genuine independent exchange gets a square deal. It naturally follows that the exhibitor will likewise be given fair, honest treatment, since he is the prime source of all Independent strength.

"The Independents have tried several plans intended to accomplish the end now sought by the new company. The first step forward was made by J. J. Murdock when he formed the international company. His efforts were not appreciated, but in time to come his name will be high on the list of Independent pioneers. The next step was the formation of the Alliance, and that has done and is still doing much good work, but the power that the Alliance possesses is insufficient to cope with certain new developments of the business. Profiting by the experiences of all former endeavors to cement the Independents into one powerful and indissoluble body, we have created the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company. At the present time we cannot see how it can be anything but a wonderful benefit to everybody sincerely interested in the Independent cause. Should the time come when it proves anything other than a benefit, that instant will sound its doom. This is the pledge extended by men who value their honor in the cause more than they value dollars and cents."

No doubt our readers have noticed the rather unique advertisements of the Paramount Film Company of New York. One of its effects has been that it is to-day one of the most talked-of exchanges in the East; but another and more important one is that the concern has been deluged with communications from exhibitors who jumed at the opportunity of getting in touch with a real live exchange. The situation in New York City is so confused that this concern has found it absolutely necessary to come forward very emphatically with regard to its affiliations. The Paramount Film Company is a comparative newcomer in the rental field, but from all present appearances they are due to establish a record for meteoric development.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE INDEPENDENTS.

Last week there was called a meeting of Independent manufacturers of motion pictures at which were present Messrs Horsley, of the Nestor Company; Bowers, of the Pantograph Corporation; Patterson and Whitmer, of the Actophone Company; I. W. Ullman, of the Columbia Film Company; Prem, representing the Lux and Le Lion Companies; Hoffman, representing the Eclair films; P. A. Powers, of the Powers Company, and A. G. Whyte, sales agent for Nestor films. The meeting was held for the purpose of discussing a proposed agreement formulated by the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company. It was explained that the Sales Company was a corporation formed by the New York Motion Picture Co. and the Independent Moving Pictures Co., who held the entire stock of the Sales Company, which proposes in future to market the product of all Independent concerns. It appears to be the desire of this company to, if possible, secure the sale of the films of other manufacturers of Independent motion pictures, thereby constituting themselves the only channel through which an Independent manufacturer could dispose of his goods to the exchanges.

The matter was fully discussed at the meeting and it was agreed that though, on the face of it, it seemed an innocent proposition, nevertheless, owing to the fact that the controlling parties of the Sales Company were leading factors in the Independent field, there was a probability of their securing control of the products of other manufacturers, the exclusive sale of which would place the Sales Company in a position to dictate to the other manufacturers and exchanges. For example: in the proposed agreement there is no guarantee to the outside manufacturer that his goods will have an assured market as to the number of copies, or length of time in excess of two weeks, in which they are obliged to sell the product of any manufacturer. An obnoxious clause in the agreement is felt to be that the manufacturer shall bind himself for a period of three years and be asked to agree to a two weeks' cancellation on the part of the Sales Company, if they so desire it. It was pointed out at the meeting that the Sales Company were borrowing an idea from the Motion Picture Patents Company, which imposes a two weeks' clause on the various exchanges, to which objection was, and still is, taken.

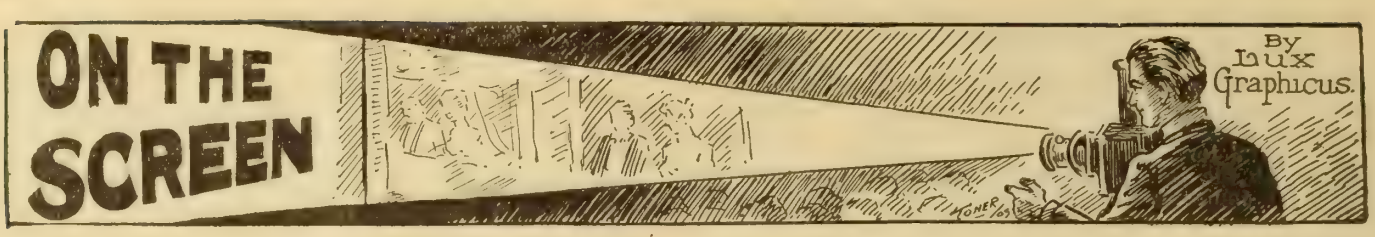
Another feature of the proposed agreement is that the Sales Company shall act as a board of censors on other manufacturers' products. This, owing to the fact that the Sales Company consists only of the New York Motion Picture Company and the Independent Moving Pictures Company, places the goods of the outside manufacturer at a disadvantage as compared with the goods of their competitors in the company, as the balance of voting power would be in their hands.

The meeting was of opinion that this scheme of the Sales Company has been formulated simply for the purpose of protecting the present sales of the two companies interested. The meeting was also of the opinion that as new manufacturers are coming into the Independent field with good photographs and are gradually, in virtue of the good qualities of those pictures, reducing the sales of the two companies, in order to keep their own market they have established the Sales Company to endeavor, with or without the assistance of the other manufacturers, to force the exchange to purchase their products exclusively, and will refuse to sell their goods to any exchange which purchases films not controlled by the Sales Company.

The meeting was also of opinion that it is the intention of these two companies to secure the signatures to the sales agreement by exchanges as quickly as possible, as they are aware that, in view of the high quality of the other manufacturers, unless this is done at once, the object they have in view will not be accomplished.

After reading the agreement presented to the manufacturers, the meeting was of opinion that it would be "commercial death" to any concern which decided to select the Sales Company as the medium for marketing their goods, owing to the fact that if they succeeded in killing off the outside manufacturers desirous of making first class photographs and controlling the exchanges, the manufacturers and exchanges who have not signed would be at the mercy of this company.

It is possibly advisable that a sales distributing company should be formed to distribute Independent films through one channel, but it was felt by the meeting that those interested in the business should have a controlling voice in the conduct of the agency through which their goods are distributed.



"The onlooker sees most of the game." And it was a great game that was played in New York City when the International Moving Picture Alliance met last week. A great game for many people, out of which the possible winners are few. Myself, at present, I am ignorant of the great game of poker—the American national game of cards. But I hope one of these days to be a neophyte in it, and maybe a proficient, because I love the beautiful sentiment of it, which is bluff.

Now, dear boys of the National Independent Moving Picture Alliance, you were all bluffing one another last week at the Imperial Hotel, and not one of you has got a little ahead of the game. The game when it is reduced down to its ultimate simplicity means what it meant last year, that someone amongst you on the Independent side will get the ascendancy of things. That is what you were all working for last year in New York City. Who the victor is to be, time alone will tell.

* * *

Personally I do not care, nor does anybody in the moving picture field. The feeling is this: that they would like to see a successor to Mr. Murdock or Mr. Freeman, both extinct volcanoes. Mr. Brulatour was elected president of the Alliance, in his absence, but I am informed that he will only bear that unlooked-for honor until he can tender his resignation, as his other multifarious duties render it impossible for him to serve.

It is a very curious situation; business conflicts with personal ambition. It is open to question whether my friend Mr. Adam Kessell wants to be the boss, or whether Charles Baumann wants to be the boss. You never know. These are two great minds in the moving picture field. The third is that of my friend I. C. Oes; the fourth is that of the amiable W. H. Swanson, unquestionably a very clever man, but one who does not show his hand. Then comes the irrepressible "Pat" Powers, also playing a hand in the game. Likewise the quiet Carl Laemmle; and the presiding genius of the Pantograph Corporation. Etcetera; etcetera!

Israel Zangwill, one of the great playwrights of the world wrote a play a year ago called the "Melting Pot," which was put upon the New York stage. And it meant this: that America was the place where a variety of races gathered and were put into a pot, reduced, evaporated and brought forth as the real American—the American of all our dreams, a typical man of the future.

* * *

Something like this was on my mind last week when taking part in and being a guest of the meeting at the Imperial Hotel. Something or somebody has got to come out of it I do not know who or what that is; it might be Brulatour of the Lumiere Company; it might be Tom Cochrane of the "Imp"; it might be Mr. Thanhouser or equally so James Whitman of the Actophone Company; it might be Charles Baumann of the New York Motion Picture Company; it might be the inscrutable Pat Powers. I do not know. When Adam and Eve were driven out of Paradise according to John Milton, "The world was all before them, where to choose." That is the cool, deliberate impression left upon my mind by studying this last meeting of the Alliance. The world is all before them where to choose.

What is needed, of course, is a Moses of the Independent situation. Murdock thought he was the Moses, and so did Chester M. Freeman. But they both failed to cross the Red Sea and lead the children of Israel out of the wilderness into which they have floundered. There are many candidates for the position of Moses, all dear, good, charming men. Which of you will be the Moses? Settle it amongst yourselves. But settle it soon.

* * *

The whole "10 o'clock in the morning" sentiment is this: Somebody has got to be the leader. You have not got a leader. It is rather a hard thing to say, but you are just a flock of sheep wandering in the wilderness and there is nobody to lead you. You had better get together and elect a real leader for the good of the business. I repeat: for the good of the business and for the good of yourselves. So that you, yourselves, may be the immediate gainers and the public the penultimate gainers. Then, by the customary circumlocutory process, the game and the profits will come back to you; otherwise the Independent side of things.

I think you have the will but not the inclination to elect a leader. When you do the latter it will be better for the business as a whole, because it will strengthen the Independent position and incidentally strengthen the trust position and reflect back upon yourselves. The trust or associated manufacturers is a strong body to-day, but it is neither invulnerable nor impregnable. "Opposition and competition do us all good." So do "attrition of mind upon mind." What is needed to-day from the point of view of the public, who are the final arbiters in the matter, is a well-organized body such as the associated manufacturers, and an equally well organized body of Independents. Then the real fight will be one of competition. The public will gain by the quality of the products, and all your pockets will be filled. At present, however, the associated manufacturers' side is quietly strong, but the people on the Independent side are noisily weak. That is the trouble: noisily weak. Are you not?

The managers of the Pastime Theater, Madison, Me., H. W. Smiley & Co., report that the illustrated song "The Cottage on the Hillside Far Away" proved to be one of their best drawing cards in a long time.

The New Palace Theater, St. Paul, Minn., was showing a few weeks since "The Converts." The treasurer, W. A. A. Mustard, speaks in terms of high praise of this film and its possibilities for great moral teaching. That more such films would do much to elevate the standard of moving pictures is unquestioned. The arrangement of the neatly printed program of this house reflects up-to-date management.

Two very realistic crack-a-jack pictures will be shortly issued by the Kalem Company. Both are carefully prepared illustrations of actual historical episodes as recounted in the school books of to-day. In the way that the Kalem people have handled these stories there is nothing of the dime novel nature so very painfully apparent in other so-called Indian stories, and one looks in vain for the inconsistencies that characterize the work of the amateur producer.

The Bijou, Fitchburg, Mass., presented the "Life of Moses," accompanied by a lecture by W. Stephen Bush, on March 21 to 23, giving an afternoon and evening exhibition each day. An exhibition of this high-class biblical picture and lecture was most appropriate at this time. It is forethought like this on the part of managers that will do much in any locality to popularize the moving picture theater. The manager of the Bijou, H. F. Jackson, forwards some photographs of billboard advertising which have brought them a perceptible increase in the right kind of patronage.

Novel Announcement Slide.—From the Brayton Mfg. Co., 122 East Randolph street, Chicago, we have received an announcement slide bearing the novel inscription: "The management has provided mirrors in the lobby for the ladies to adjust their hats. Please remove your hats during the performance." The World representative says that this slide has made a great hit at the Orpheum Theater in Chicago, as they have large mirrors in the lobby and also provide hatpins for their lady patrons. No doubt this slide will have as great a vogue as the one "Just to remind you" which was issued by the Brayton people some time ago. The Brayton slides are very tastefully colored and worthy the attention of exhibitors.

The Moving Picture World would like to hear from exhibitors as to what were the most popular films they have shown during the past three months. Which have received the most applause or have been most favorably commented upon by the public? Which have they expressed a wish to see the second time?

COMMENTS ON THE FILMS

"A Ranchman's Wooing" (Essanay).—Here is offered a solution of the wedding problem which will perhaps help others in a similar dilemma. The widow won't marry him until he disposes of his four single daughters, and proposes kicking the lovers off the place to make them elope. The scheme works to perfection and he gets the widow, while the girls get the fellows they want. This is all worked out humor-

ously and brings many a laugh before it finishes. This character of play is admirably produced by the Essanay actors. They put just the right spirit and dash into it to make it interesting and attractive. One pretty scene is the reproduction of a barn dance and the Virginia reel to the music of an old fiddler.

"The Airship Gaze" (Essanay).—The amusing stunts performed by a crowd of people who are watching a flying machine as it circles in the air. It is a sort of rough-house combination, but is such an accurate reproduction of what people do under such circumstances that it is extremely funny.

"The Fall of Babylon" (Gaumont).—A Biblical picture which, for setting, sumptuousness of staging and costuming and close attention to detail, has never been surpassed. All the important events of the fall of that great city are reproduced, following closely the narrative in the Bible. The best available sources of information were followed in the preparation of the costumes. The staging is made to reproduce, so far as is possible now, the appearance of the city, or those parts of it which are shown. One scarcely feels like attempting a criticism, since the producer, who must have expended a great deal of time upon it, had access to information with which the average person is unfamiliar. Necessarily it is impossible to offer anything that would be helpful in a situation like this. Perhaps when it is said the picture follows closely the Bible narrative and emphasizes by graphic illustration the impression which the story may have produced, that is sufficient. The firm is to be congratulated upon producing such an important picture in such a sumptuous and altogether satisfactory manner.

"Foxy Ernest" (Pathe).—A humorous skit which introduces a novelty in the hiding of a gentleman in a huge clock, which eventually finds its way into his own house as a present to his wife. The gentleman very astutely observes that he selected the hiding place for reasons of his own, which should satisfy anyone who possessed the smallest modicum of comprehension.

"A Conquest" (Pathe).—An amusing picture which depicts graphically and forcibly the punishment meted out to a masher who annoyed a beautiful woman and was allowed to see her home, only to be unceremoniously kicked down the steps by her husband.

"The Wife of Marcius" (Selig).—A story of intrigue in ancient Rome, in which one attempts to win the love of his friend's wife, but even though he practices all sorts of machinations to accomplish his purpose, he fails and adequate deserts are meted out to him. An attractive feature of this picture is the reproduction of scenes in a Roman house. The details are worked out with close attention to the details of the manners and customs of that time so that, apart from its interest as a story, the film contains much of actual educational interest. Acting and photography combine to make a technically satisfactory picture.

"A Broken Spell" (Vitagraph).—A picture which is interesting dramatically in that it develops possibilities which fortunately never come to realities. The fascination of a musician for an impressionable woman is the basis for the story, but, fortunately, she recognizes her own weakness and the dancer into which it has led her and escapes from the consequences before she is entirely enmeshed. Such occurrences, while not usual, are far too common, and possibly the effect of this picture may be beneficial.

"The Dreamer" (Gaumont).—A bit of comedy which contains a number of surprising and wholly unexpected features. The effect is inexpressibly funny in places.

"Amateur Billiards" (Gaumont).—An amusing representation of how amateurs play billiards. There are many things shown which are not always included in the game, but perhaps the amateurs are not all so lively or do not know so many queer ways of playing. Billiard players will enjoy this travesty upon their favorite game.

"O'er Crag and Torrent" (Gaumont).—A good reproduction of rough crags and mountain torrents. Wholly scenic in character, the picture exhibits the characteristics of both the stones and the water in a way that will appeal to those who know them as they are. The selection of the various points of view is to be commended, while the technical work has been excellently done.

"Lorenzo, the Wolf" (Pathe).—A romantic picture, centering around a love story which includes the abduction of a girl and shutting her up in a cave. There is a rescue party in which the lover whom the girl's father did not like proves himself a hero, the kidnapper is killed and the young people live happy ever after. It may be that the chief interest in this picture will center around the good reproductions of mountain scenery and the activities of the hunting party.

"Athletic Sports in India" (Pathe).—A reproduction of athletic sports in India, well chosen and clearly photographed. In some instances the photographic work was difficult, but has been well done. It will afford very many persons an idea of sports in that far away strange country.

"The Fruits of Vengeance" (Vitagraph).—A strongly dramatic picture worked out with all the skill and careful attention to details which characterize the work of this company. The appeal will be principally along the line of dramatic work. The story is made interesting by the clever interpretation and its development at the hands of this capable company is made extremely interesting.

"The Smoker" (Biograph).—Perhaps a bit of sarcasm is concealed under the clever acting which characterizes this excellent picture. Any smoker will agree that it is difficult indeed to break away from the habit, but not all rent premises where they can smoke in comfort and where it will not annoy their wives. In this instance jealousy intervenes and clearly trouble is brewing. Fortunately, however, the wife is sensible and the difficulty ends by the removal of her objections and the privilege of hubby enjoying his smoke at home. Admirably acted and clearly photographed, the film deserves the attention it receives.

"His Last Dollar" (Biograph).—A delicious bit of comedy, representing a young man attempting to do some entertaining upon his last dollar. He gets his deserts, as might be expected, and then to cap the whole the girl who got him into all this trouble leaves him abruptly when another gentleman appears. He retires to the lemon grove to muse upon the difficulties that beset one who attempts to satisfy a champagne appetite upon a beer income.

"The Daughter's Choice" (Lubin).—A simple tale, well told, which thrills and excites heart interest as it runs. It is told in good acting and with the best of photography. While not sensational, it contains much that interests and holds the attention of the audience throughout.

"As It is in Life" (Biograph).—Whether this picture is true to life or not is a question which must be decided by each individual for himself, but it is not too much to say that it contains much human nature. Personal jealousies often play a larger part in the lives of individuals than is realized, and this picture is based upon this potent fact. But there is some degree of happiness injected into the old man's life when the grandchild is taken to him and he agrees with the mother that it is quite the most beautiful baby ever seen. But the principal point of interest will center around the representation of personal jealousies which develop as the story is told. Acting and photography are both adequate and the picture will undoubtedly create more than ordinary interest.

"Back to Boarding" (Lubin).—A comedy which will not fail to get both laughter and applause. The why and wherefore is so clearly depicted in the film that it requires no further explanation here. It develops the degree of humor which has made so many Lubin comedies popular, and should add materially to any program of which it is a part.

"The Good Boss" (Pathe).—A picture representing a spirit on the part of an employer which would go a long way toward settling the difficulties between labor and capital. Not that every employer could do as this one did, but every employer, as is here depicted, could show something of sympathy in what his employees are doing. It is one of those Pathe films in which the actors touch the very springs of human existence in such a simple and natural way that all audiences, whether large or small, cannot fail to be interested.

"Agra" (Pathe).—Beautifully colored and interesting views of one of the large cities of the Indian empire. The scenes are faithful reproductions of the actual life of the town as it filed before the camera man. It is another in the series of travel pictures which have come from the Pathe studio and which have added much to the information of the world.

"The Common Enemy" (Selig).—A war picture representing graphically, and in a natural way, the fear which the guerrillas of the Civil War excited. There is the dispatch of a messenger, the daughter of the house, and her wounding to add a heart interest, while the timely arrival of the soldiers and the wiping out of the band of marauders supplies a fitting climax to the picture. It is worked out with the care which characterizes the work of the Selig players and represents scenes which were too common for comfort and safety during those trying times.

"A Drama of the Mountain Pass" (Gaumont).—A picture representing the robbery of a number of tourists among the Pyrenees. The guilt of the innkeeper who advises the trip is afterward established. While the story possesses its due share of interest, probably the most attractive portion will be the mountain scenery and the representation of mountain climbing which is given. The mountains are picturesque and rugged, and the operator performed his part well. In some ways this is one of the best mountain pictures this firm has ever turned out. The operator selected his viewpoints with considerable care and with a full appreciation of the requirements of the picture.

"Poetry of the Waters" (Gaumont).—A picture like this is beyond description. It is a series of ten views taken off the southern coast of France, representing early morning, brilliant noontide and darkening evening. The operator was an artist of more than ordinary ability and his work was performed with a finish and perfection which could not be questioned. The picturesque scenery, augmented by the beauties of the different hours of the day represented, have combined to form a picture which will linger long in the memory.

"From Shadow to Sunshine" (Vitagraph).—Sometimes when one sees a picture of this sort one wonders if such things are possible in every-day life, or if, after all, these stories are made up for the benefit of those to whom the world looks dark. Such remembrance as is shown by this actress is to be commended, and maybe there is something like it in the world. At any rate, it is refreshing to see it even in a motion picture; and the Vitagraph actors, who play it so well, are to be congratulated for their good work. Even a suggestion of this sort is helpful. The reality would indicate a change in the human animal.

"The Heart of a Rose" (Edison).—A tender love story, filled with strong passion and the dramatic power of attempted repression of an affection that cannot be denied. The dramatic scenes follow each other in such quick succession that one has scarcely time to realize one before another is presented. Perhaps the most dramatic of all is the one in which the old professor realizes the conditions, renounces his own love and gives the girl to the younger man. It is one of those films which cannot be described, and is scarcely susceptible of criticism. The strong emotions of the heart are so clearly shown that one's interest never flags and one's sympathies are never given an opportunity to rest. The acting is above the ordinary standard, convincing in its fidelity to the story, and the photography is clear and satisfactory.

"It Pays to Advertise" (Edison).—A really delicious comedy which illustrates what persistence and unique methods will accomplish in the face of adverse circumstances. Anyhow, the girl who refused the young man on Sunday found his promised daily proposal staring at her every day in the week until on Saturday she is desperate and stays at home to tell him what the thinks of him and his methods. One need not disclose here the happy ending, since the picture tells that so graphically that it cannot be misunderstood, and the touch of real art in the closing scene is an attractive addition.

"Imagination" (Essanay).—Here is a comendy that will make your patrons laugh, no matter how morose and gloomy they may be. It holds the interest from beginning to end because of the succession of wholly unexpected incidents which are strung together with a thread of humor that is one of the funniest yet put out by this house. The fun is fast and furious most of the way.

"Henry's New Hat" (Essanay).—A companion to the above and done quite as effectively and satisfactorily. It is quite as funny, though in a totally different way, and no manager need fear the result when he puts this picture on the screen.

"Uprising of the Utes" (Kalem).—Another of the Indian pictures this house is releasing now. While the essential features of the Indian character are substantially the same in all the different tribes represented, minor details of dress and action are worked out with care and in most instances the actors have succeeded in depicting successfully the characteristics of the nations represented. In this instance an uprising is made the basis of a thrilling Indian story and the action which centers around it is sufficiently graphic to afford a reasonably accurate impression of what actually occurred during these uprisings. The company has done good work in this, as well as other Indian pictures, and deserves commendation for its efforts.

"Wandering Willie's April Fool's Day" (Kalem).—A farce which graphically represents the results of an April Fool day upon a Wandering Willie. The picture has many laughs concealed about its person and will prove a popular film wherever shown.

"The Duchess de Langeais" (Pathe).—A love story with a distinct French setting. The duchess, piqued at the coldness of a famous general, decides to make him love her, and before they know it both are in love. The last scene is in a convent, where the general discovers the body of his love in a lonely cell, and there imprints his first and last kiss upon her brow. As a heart story it holds the attention of the audience, developing interest as it proceeds and causing one to wonder if such things can be. The acting and staging are both excellent, and the photography is without a blemish.

"The Vintage" (Pathe).—Few people in America, where the manufacture of wine is a comparatively new industry, know how it is made. This industrial film will be a source of information to all such and deserves a place in the category of educational subjects. The picture is made upon the sunny slopes of the hillside of Southern France and all the essential operations of wine making are graphically shown. Perhaps it was not so intended, but in any case the expression on the face of the taster adds a touch of humor, since it is evident that he is fond of his occupation.

"The Fly Pest" (Urban).—Perhaps no more effective representation of the dangers from flies could be devised than this. It represents, in a much enlarged form, all the stages of a fly's growth, and shows how it carries contagion by illustrating the steps across a screen where every touch of the foot results in leaving thousands of microbes developing all sorts of contagious diseases. The picture is revolting and very forcibly impresses upon an audience the dangers of the fly pest. Boards of health could use this with good results in impressing their lessons upon the public.

"Her Father's Choice" (Urban).—No explanation of this picture is needed. It is a love story with a simple plot, but so well told that it is easily understood. The cowardice of the choice of the girl's father makes it possible for the young man in the case to win his sweetheart.

"Further Adventures of the Girl Spy" (Kalem).—A war story that promises to be popular, since it details graphically what purports to be the adventures of a girl spy. Such stories usually thrill with adventure and in this instance the story is made to seem very real. Acting and photography are both satisfactory and convincing, while the setting assists materially in making the story plain. This company has a knack of making such pictures seem real. Often they are so realistic that one seems to live over the scenes with the characters. To some extent that is true in this picture, and undoubtedly very many will enjoy the picture and appreciate the story.

"A Woman's Caprice" (Pathe).—Apparently a dream, but with a memory which was pleasant for one short while. Perhaps this picture will be chiefly interesting because it represents how easily a person's head may be turned. The same conditions could scarcely exist in America, but the chief features might be reproduced in all essential features and possibly the effect would be the same. At any rate, it may have the effect of pointing some fluttering moth to the danger which besets near the glowing flame.

"The Rhine Falls at Schaffhausen" (Pathe).—A romantic scene adequately photographed and correctly colored. The waters tumble over the rocks which break them into exquisite masses of fleecy foam. One fancies the roar of the waters can be distinctly heard as the waters plunge over the rocks. The photographer did his work well. His point of view was well chosen and he succeeded in conveying the impression of a real cataract. The colorist understood how to represent the marvelous beauty of the scene, developing them so graphically and naturally that a lasting impression will be made upon each individual who sees the excellent pictures.

"The Tongue of Scandal" (Vitagraph).—One of this firm's excellently told stories, sympathetically acted and adequately photographed. Perhaps one might discern a lesson more or less pronounced in its unfolding. Altogether it is a good film and worthy exhibition by any manager.

"A Rich Revenge" (Biograph).—A delicious comedy in which revenge is turned into a gold mine by that mysterious destiny which shapes all lives, and does it in spite of those most affected. If anyone had told the victims of this villain's schemes that the very thing which apparently ruined them would bring them wealth, they would have laughed at it, or would have deemed it altogether impossible. The only weak point in the story, or the only point which one might wish different, is that in which the speculator, in no wise interested in the lovers' quarrel, loses his money. Possibly, however, the end may justify this slight deviation from what seems the correct path. As a whole the picture is a choice bit of comedy, sure to please any audience fortunate enough to see it.

"First Love Is Best" (Lubin).—A picture detailing the experience of two country girls who go to the city, one after the other, and are both deceived by the same man. The country sweethearts meet the swindler and proceed to pummel him in most effective fashion. The principal interest in this picture is in the contrast of scene, showing graphically the sharp distinction between city and country. The personalities depicted are also sharply drawn, adding zest and a life touch to the picture that increases its value materially. The acting is in the best style of Lubin's players, and the photography is equally satisfactory. The interest of the picture is heightened by the fact that the usual thing does not happen to the two country girls.

"Hugo, the Hunchback" (Selig).—A highly romantic drama, representing a young sculptor, maltreated and abused. The wares of the sculptor are broken by Bertrand, a noble. The years pass. The sculptor, rich and honored, Bertrand a beggar through dissipation. The contrasts make the picture strong and the love story is quite sufficient to supply the heart interest. A graphic illustration, perhaps, of what might be considered the peculiarities of fate.

"The Flower of the Ranch" (Essanay).—A melodramatic story, told about some Western characters, big-hearted and liberal, contrasted with a despicable gentlemanly appearing man who apparently makes it his business to go about breaking up homes. A winsome little girl grows to womanhood under the fostering care of the cowboys. There is a romance that is almost interrupted and there are tragedies that serve to develop an interest. Th chase of the cowboys after the flying automobile is thrilling, but it must be confessed that one permits a sigh of relief to escape when the car breaks down and Dorothy is rescued from her dangerous position. One feature to be commended is that the law is represented as taking its course rather than depicting, or even suggesting, a lynching. The less such things are shown, or suggested, the better it is.

"Michael Strogoff" (Edison).—A graphic reproduction of Jules Verne's famous story under the above title. It deals with a secret mission in Russia and must necessarily be dramatic. The scenes follow each other in such quick succession that they are almost bewildering, yet through them all the splendidly dramatic character of Strogoff stands out in sharp relief, so well is it acted. There are the thrilling scenes along the frontier, the attempted blinding with a hot sword, and finally the duel in the palace, with the closing tableau. It would be difficult to conceive of a succession of stronger dramatic scenes. They afford ample opportunity for excellent acting and the story is developed so naturally that one lives over the scenes with the characters. Along with good acting has gone good photography, the whole forming a satisfactory film.

INDEPENDENT FILMS

"Rivalry of Two Guides" (Itala).—A little story of jealousy laid among the mountains, interesting no more for the story than for the scenery which is used as a background. Cutting the bridge, the fall of the woman and the rescue are thrilling scenes which will please almost any audience. The mountain scenery is well reproduced, the picture conveying the impression of real mountains. The photography has been well managed and the printer performed his part of the contract satisfactorily.

"Tsing, the Yellow Devil" (Great Northern).—A thrilling and convincing detective story worked out with all the care and attention which characterize the Great Northern films. The same qualities of acting and the same effort to make the acting sympathetic is shown here that were such prominent factors in the success of the Sherlock Holmes series. It is a thrilling story, wonderfully well told.

"The Servant and the Tutor" (Itala).—A story of the falsity of a supposed friend and his robbery of a girl committed to his care by a dying father. It takes some years, but finally the girl obtains her fortune through the good offices of an old servant, who serves a term in prison for attempting to help her. Perhaps the fact that the ending is happy and the wrongdoer is adequately punished is sufficient to compensate for the disagreeable features of the early portion of the picture.

"Foolshead Wishes to Marry the Governor's Daughter" (Itala).—Another of the Foolshead series which has become popular. In this instance Foolshead wins by a combination of favorable circumstances, including the locking of the girl's father in a wardrobe, along with others, from which he cannot escape until he consents to the wedding. Some of Foolshead's adventures, as he is hurled from the slope are extremely amusing. It is difficult to understand how he can hit so many things as he rolls.

"Hard Cash" (Imp).—A story of a swindle which cost the life of an honest old sea captain and left his family destitute. The picture contains a rather exciting view of a fire and a rescue, which leads to a discovery that secures for the widow and her children their father's long lost money. While the story is without special interest beyond its human features, it is well acted and clearly photographed. One may not, perhaps, agree wholly with the introduction of occasional comedy features into a play as serious as this. Here and there an attempt to be funny may be noted, but possibly it is considered that these digressions are essential as a means of emphasis in the presentation of the more serious portion.

"The Miser's Daughter" (Imp).—A lively picture showing the trick played upon a rich old bachelor, whom a certain father was forcing his daughter to marry against her will. She succeeds in foisting a homely domestic upon the aforesaid bachelor in her place, and not until the promised money in the transaction is delivered to the girl's father does the duped bachelor realize the deception. It is acted with a snap and dash that make it interesting; the photography is good and the climax, when the bachelor discovers his predicament and tries to get away, but is forcibly prevented, is very laughable.

"Madame Sans Gene" (Great Northern).—An excellent picture built upon a number of episodes in the life of the great Napoleon, beginning when he is an impecunious lieutenant and continuing up to the escape of Count Neupport. Perhaps its principal interest will center in the representation of scenes in camp life. These are made very graphic and are carefully worked out. The fact that Napoleon pardoned the count and countess for their part in Neupport's escape, after one of his characteristic outbursts of anger, adds a pleasing touch that increases the picture's interest. The acting is sympathetic and the photography is adequate.

"The Theater of Phenomenons" (Eclair).—A film representing the antics of a collection of freaks at a theater. The film is filled with satire depicted by these people, who are apparently so ill assorted and unfortunate in form and expression. To see is to laugh and, while the film will probably amuse the children more than it does grown-ups, older people will not be adverse to looking at it.

"After the Fall of the Eagle" (Eclair).—A dramatic and, in some respects, novel picture, the scene of which is laid in France after the fall of Napoleon. A young general, an officer of the former emperor, is sacrificed needlessly, merely to gratify the passions of the mob. There is a dramatic scene when the maid rushes into the room and confesses her part in the tragedy which follows as soon as the officer is given over to the rebel mob. But it is too late, and the old marquis is left weeping over the dead body of the man he might have saved.

"Romance of a Snake Charmer" (Bison).—The principal interest in this picture centers around the handling of the snakes by the girl charmer. It is disagreeable, to be sure, but few can resist its great attraction; nor will they refuse to look at it. The romance, which is based upon the infatuation of a country girl for a city man, is much like other romances of a similar character. It supplies a heart interest, but the handling of the snakes will be the principal source of attraction in the film.

"Frontier Day in the West" (Nestor).—A graphic picture of an old home day in the West with a reproduction of all the old sports and pastimes accurately depicted. There is a touch of hominess which arouses pleasurable emotions and brings one again among the old familiar scenes. A thrilling feature is introduced in the stealing of a horse and the capture of the thief. The whole picture breathes the spirit of home and old-time pleasures.

"An Unpleasant Dream" (Ambrosio).—Shall or shall not the boys be pushed into the world? That question weighs heavily upon the father's mind as he muses before the fire. He dreams, and the dream seems to prove that it is better for them not to wander away. Whatever may be one's belief in this respect, this picture will set him thinking, and because of this the picture will rouse one's interest.

"My Life Remembrances of a Day" (Ambrosio).—A story which will arouse interest in the minds of more than one in the audience. The picture is well photographed and should prove a good addition to any manager's list.

"The Snake Man" (Lux).—Depicts the adventures of a man who succeeded in turning himself into a human snake, swallowing numerous and sundry persons. Later he is forced to disgorge what he has swallowed with amusing results. While the picture tells no important story, it is mildly amusing and is not unpleasant. The stunts performed by the snake in his various crawls are musing and the novelty is at least refreshing.

"Rico, the Jester" (Lux).—The heart story of an ill-visaged jester who falls in love with a blind girl and dreads to have her sight restored. After many vicissitudes the ending is happy enough to suit anyone.

"A Shot in Time' (Bison).—A melodramatic picture, the scene of which is laid in a rattle snake infested region of the West. It is picturesque, but perhaps one may be pardoned for feeling an occasional unpleasant thrill when snake hunting operations are proceeding. There is a love story, intensified by jealousy. It is a masterly touch where the glass containing the deadly rattlesnake poison is broken by a shot as the man raises it to drink. Such a novelty can do no less than excite interest in the picture and cause favorable comments upon its excellence.

"His Second Wife" (Imp).—A stepmother story which does not always find its counterpart in real life. But the dramatic quality of the picture cannot be questioned, as the stepmother comes to a realization of what she has done and exerts herself to make amends for her thoughtless cruelty. If such stories were only true in real life, one thinks, how much sorrow and misunderstanding and misery would be avoided.

The Majestic Theater, Charleroix, Mich., has inaugurated a new departure in attractive fronts for moving picture theaters. The rustic effect shown by the picture on page 562 is certainly neat, attractive and decorative, and is the work of Mr. J. A. Lynn, The Rustic Man, whose advertisement appears on another page of this issue. Mr. A. F. Young of the Majestic Theater Company advises us that they are very well pleased with the appearance of the front. The theater has a seating capacity of 455, and is managed by Mr. W. C. Campbell, formerly of the Alnew Theater, Cadillac, Mich.

OPERATORS' COLUMN.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Conducted by F. H. Richardson.

Flicker Trouble.—Vermont asks what to do to remedy flicker.

The machine you have always has more or less flicker at normal speed, by reason of excessive shutter width. Inserting a thin washer, as you suggest, would take up lost motion in gears. This lost motion would not produce flicker, however. It might, if bad enough, make a travel ghost by allowing the shutter to get just a trifle out of time. I think the shutter gears would have to be very badly worn, however, to produce this. But, nevertheless the washer scheme is all right. Many operators frame up their film on the make of machine you are using by looking through the projection lens when threading the film, first setting the frame-up lever central. This is by reason of the fact that, as the shutter travels with the frame-up carriage, it is in an entirely different position as regards the aperture when clear up or clear down than when frame-up carriage is central. Often this machine will show slight travel ghost when frame-up is up or down, but none when it is central. I am of the opinion that the fault lies largely in the shape of the shutter. Other mechanisms whose shutter does not follow the frame-up carriage in its travel do not develop this fault, nor do some whose shutter does. Your query is a hard one to answer positively without personal inspection of the machine, but I believe it is about as above stated and that you cannot eliminate the flicker, it being a fault of the machine itself.

Bad Light.—Las Animas, Col., writes: "Can you tell us what causes slight yellow tinge at sides (not top or bottom) of pictures? Use 115-volt alternating through compensarc. Have tried moving lamp and about everything else we could think of. We are using 60 amperes."

Data is very incomplete for intelligent answer. However, will suggest a few things and if I don't hit it you must send size (width) of picture and length of throw and all other data. Carefully examine your curtain and see if the fault is not in it. Turn your projection lens one-quarter around and see if it changes anything. Clean your projection lenses, inside and out, also condensing lenses, washing them with wood alcohol and polishing with soft, clean cloth. Look through them (the condenser lenses) sidewise and see if the glass is clear and white. Move your lamp over to one side (the arc, I mean) and see if that clears up one side of the curtain. See if light is striking sides of hole in operating room. See if there is anything on the inside of the machine which is interfering in the light. Change the set of your carbons. Move lamp forward until you have a large spot and see what effect that has. From what you say I take it the fault is permanent. That is to say, it is present all the time and does not change. This would indicate trouble is not in the arc itself.

Condenser Breakage.—Lancaster, Ohio, writes that he has been running a certain make of lamphouse and has not broken a condenser in six months. He installed a new one of different make and breaks six in three days. He tried running with the whole top open and with lamphouse entirely closed. Wants suggestion as to trouble.

The lamphouse you now have (the new one) is an excellent article. It has faults, however, and it is quite possible they are making the mischief. I would advise you to dispense with the metal clips which hold the lenses and to punch two small holes in the condenser casing on either side, near its top, or in its top, also two holes in its bottom. These holes will provide ventilation which is lacking in the condenser casing. There should be some ventilation in the casing, particularly if you run with the lamphouse open. Condenser breakage is one of the toughest problems we have to tackle, but I think this will, at the least, help some anyhow. You understand that you can put in the lenses without the clips, or metal frames, and that is what I mean by "dispensing with the clips."

Weak Tension Spring.—Mr. F. R. Ritchie, Park Theater, Dowagiac, Mich., writes as follows, and I thank him for the information, though I am inclined to think it will not fit, as "Middleport" named some makes of film which are noted for their steady running stock as jumpers, and some thin stock films as steady runners:

"If Middleport, Ohio, will carefully examine his tension springs he will find them to be weak. Put in a new spring. Some films seem to be thinner than others, which would cause them to jump more. Keep springs tight against the film and it cannot jump. I had the same trouble and found the remedy by experimenting."

It is true, friend Ritchie, tightening the tension springs against the film will operate to eliminate jumping, but it is not always advisable to take advantage of this fact. Too tight a tension wears the aperture plate tracks and film excessively, also puts more strain than you may imagine on the intermittent movement and, for that matter, the whole mechanism. The office of the tension springs is to stop the film in front of the aperture when the intermittent completes its movement and hold it tight against the aperture plate tracks, without vibration, until the intermittent again begins to move. There should be no more tension than just enough to accomplish this purpose. Anything more is distinctly bad. Many operators resort to increased tension instead of properly adjusting their intermittent to take up lost motion. There is a difference in thickness of film stock. It varies as much as 2-1,000 of an inch, but this would not be sufficient to change the tension pressure in any appreciable degree. Thin stock vibrates and jumps more than does the heavy, however, as it has not the stiffness to withstand the shock of sudden stopping and starting as well as does the thicker film. It is, of course, quite possible to have your tension too slack. I am not asserting that Mr. Richie has too much tension, but merely calling his attention to the fact that he, and other operators as well, should be very careful about unduly increasing tension.

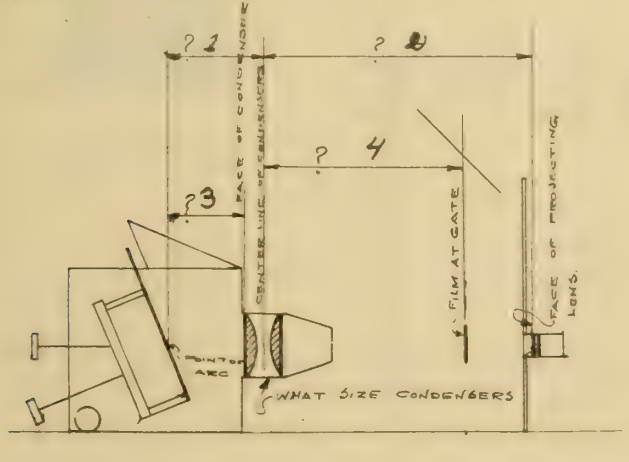
Some Information Asked.—Wellsville, Ohio, asks the following questions and sends drawing, which is reproduced: (1) After giving data regarding current, kind of machine, etc., he says:: "We sometimes have a dark spot in center of curtain. (2) Our projection lens is an Edison No. 2, what size is it known as? (3) What focal length condensers should I have for 8 x 11 picture at 45 feet? (4) What should disatnces be as per attached sketch? (5) What do you think of flat sided carbons for eliminating flicker with alternating current? (6) How may I determine focal length of my present condensers?"

(1) Probably dark spot is due to wrong focal length condensers. Move lamphouse back to eliminate it. Get proper condensers. It is quite possible also that spot is caused by occasionally getting your carbons set wrong. In this case the spot would be shadow of lower carbon tip. Remedy is to set lower tip back so that it will not interfere. That is to say, that would be the remedy if you set the same as for direct current. If you use what is known as the "jackknife" set you will have this effect occasionally in spite of all you can do. I take it from your sketch, however, you use the D. C. set, which, in my judgment, gives best results in the long run. (2) Your lens figures pretty close to 4 inches, equivalent focus. The Edison No. 2 is supposed to be a 2½-inch back focus or 4-inch equivalent focus lens. (3) Two 7½-inch lenses. (4)



THROWING PICTURE 8 FEET BY 11 FEET
AT A DISTANCE OF 45 FEET.
WHAT SHOULD ABOVE DISTANCES BE?

It must be understood that definite measurements cannot be given to fit all cases. Measurement No. 3 will vary with focal length of condensers, but is usually stated at about 3½ inches. No. 1 would be No. 3 plus distance from face of inner condenser to center line between the two. This varies somewhat, but it is considered good practice to set the two condenser lenses as close together as possible. In measurement No. 4 there is a wide leeway. It seems to make no real difference within reasonable range, say from 12 to 15 or even 18 inches. In general, however, the shorter the focal length of condenser lens, provided you have a projection lens to fit your condensers, the closer the lamphouse should be to the machine. It is very seldom, however, that condenser lenses and projection lenses really fit each other. Measurement No. 3 should be from front side of front lens, not from center as shown. I have answered it that way. Measurement No. 2 will be No. 4 plus whatever the back focus of your projection lens may be. (5) I have found no advantage whatever in using flat sided carbons. That is my personal experience only. (6) Pin a sheet of white paper on a wall back not less than 10 feet from a window. Further is even better. Hold condenser lens with flat side to paper and move in and out, being sure to hold square with the paper, until image of window is sharply defined on the paper. Measure from flat side of lens to the paper and that is focal length (back focus) of the lens. You may measure the back focus of projection lens exactly the same way. Measuring from paper to center line between the two lenses of the projector gives equivalent focus. The equivalent focus of a condenser is half the back focus of one of the lenses, provided both lenses be the same focal length. If not, you may measure, as above set forth, from center line between the two lenses to the paper. I am speaking now of measuring the two condenser lenses together as they stand in their mounting. Mount them in cardboard tube for measuring if necessary. Equivalent focus of the condenser and projection lens should be the same.

Film Buckles or Bad Lens.—Troy, Ohio, says: "We notice, especially when any printing appears, that the outside of picture appears plain, whereas its center is out of focus. In printed matter the central letters appear confused."

Taking into consideration the machine you have, I would almost swear your trouble lies in the projector lens. In other words, you have a poor lens. If there is another house in your town try to borrow their lens long enough to test it on your machine and if the trouble disappears with its use the case is proven. Otherwise have your film exchange send you a lens to try out. It is also possible the trouble lies in your aperture plate or tension springs. If tracks are worn on aperture plate or if one or both tension springs set too far in or out (do not bear squarely on tracks) it will probably cause the film to cup out or in a trifle as it passes the aperture and this would produce exactly the condition you describe. Remedy is a new aperture plate or set springs right, as the case may be. I, for certain reasons, believe, however, the fault lies in your lens. Cheap projection lenses do not have a flat field. The Goerlach-Manhattan Company will send their lenses on approval.

VOLTAGE.

By F. H. Richardson.

I note that some of my good friends are writing excellent articles asserting that I am wrong in the matter of drop in voltage through rheostatic resistance and setting forth their reasons for opposing my views. I do not care to enter further into this matter, except to say that my position is unchanged. I freely admit that the position of my opponents can be readily proven by the usual formulas and rules, but that in no wise convinces me that I am wrong. I take the position that there is something in this connection that is as yet not understood. I take the position that voltage and amperage are two separate and distinct qualities, which, acting together, produce electromotive force—horse power. The contention that all voltage is dissipated, absorbed or used in the rheostat and arc does not appeal to common sense. As a matter of fact, it is my belief that the voltmeter is, in this case, a left handed prevaricator. I don't know exactly what does take place, and by that same token I don't think anyone else does. But, as a plain matter of common sense, it appears to me that: (a) there can be no possible way for anything, either voltage or amperage, or both combined, to reach the negative wire except through the arc and rheostat and the lamps of the system; (b) if all voltage is all absorbed, dissipated, consumed or used in the resistance and in the arc and lamps there cannot possibly be anything at all on the negative. This may be electrical heresy, but it is common sense. My whole contention is that, as I have said, there is something here that as yet none of us understand. In closing let me say that I have read the letters criticising me in this connection with much interest and wish to thank my friends for their kindness even while opposing my views.

CHICAGO NOTES.

As we go to press, B. W. Beadell, of the National Waterproof Film Company, informs us that his concern has secured a contract from the Pathe Freres Company to waterproof the reels of the Roosevelt in Africa pictures for the licensed exchanges of Chicago. This concern is growing in popularity and the saving involved in the waterproofing process is fast becoming known to the exchanges who are anxious to preserve their films.

The article which appeared in our issue of April 2 and signed "C. Y." touched on a subject of vital importance in the moving picture field. The lighting systems in several houses are not at all what they should be, but at the same time Mr. "C. Y." seems to be either misinformed or has misjudged certain conditions which he claims to be existent in the Orpheum Theater. Mr. Levin, who is in charge of the Orpheum, has different views of this matter and wishes a few points brought out in answer to this recent article. The lights in the Orpheum Theater are situated at a distance of eighty feet from the stage, and, according to Mr. Levin, tests have been made with the lights and the result was that the same clear, sharp lines of the picture were obtainable with a totally dark house and when the side lights were thrown on. Mr. Levin has the endorsement of a number of authorities on the equipment of the motion picture theater who are all in favor of the lighting system now in vogue at the Orpheum. The test of observant distance was made and the same result was obtainable from the rear of the house and when seated close to the screen.

Another criticism was made in the article of April 2 on the screen used in the Orpheum. Mr. Levin states that a screen of lath and plaster, such as Mr. "C. Y." suggested, is not consistent, as an eighteen-foot stage lies back of the present screen and they do not want this stage closed in for reasons that they do not care to make public at this time. Again, the position of this screen was criticised, but it appears that the angle at which it is hung enables those on the main floor and in the balcony to obtain a correct view and their line of sight strike a balance in the throw. At this tilt of the screen the pictures do not appear distorted from any part of the house and Mr. Levin feels that the criticism on this point is rather unjust, as he considers the Orpheum one of the best arranged houses on the circuit.

The Jones, Linick, Schaeffer trio announce the opening of a new picture house in a few days. At present the site of the Unique Theater, at 276 State street, is being remodeled and within a short time the doors will open on a beautifully equipped house which will be known as The Lyric, where they will exhibit three reels of films and offer two illustrated singers at every performance. This adds another link to their extensive chain of smaller theaters and before long it is expected that this corporation will own and control practically every picture house in the city of Chicago.

The Alcazar, the Casino and the Pastime have discontinued vaudeville for the time being and are paying more attention to appropriate music to the pictures. We presume that this is only an experiment on their part, as no definite policy has been announced, but we shall watch the result with interest.

NELSON-WOLGAST PICTURES.

The Great Western Film Company, of San Francisco, recently attained a remarkable achievement in the taking and reproduction of fight picture films. The fight between Ad. Wolgast and Battling Nelson lasted until after sundown on February 22, the finish of which came in the fortieth round, which closed the fight at 6.20 p.m. None of the other cameras around the ring caught any impression after the thirty-eighth round, but the motion picture boys managed to catch the men in action through the finish, which is truly a phenomenal piece of work in the animated picture field. As this fight is the first since the taking of moving pictures of glove contests where the battle lasted until after dark, the pictures are of exceptional interest for the remarkable clearness of the fighters in motion which is portrayed in them. When the contest progressed into the night the fighters are sharply silhouetted on the canvas with every move clearly and distinctly impressed. The interest in these pictures is greatly enhanced owing to the fact that this film is considered the greatest of any fight pictures yet displayed with the exception of that of the Burns-Johnson fight, which is acclaimed the monarch. The Great Western Film Company is now making a specialty of the taking of fight pictures and with their financial securities they have a competent staff of hustlers who are ever on the go and are considered factors in the recent success of this company.

ESSANAY NOTES.

C. M. Anderson, our Western producer, and picture crew are now located on a ranch near golden Colorado, where they shall continue making Western pictures. This vicinity is especially picturesque and we may expect some fine scenic work in future Essanay Western productions. While in Denver, Mr. Anderson recruited a number of new people for his stock company.

Although every line of business in a moving picture play is pre-arranged even before the actors rehearse their parts, oftentimes in the taking of pictures, especially outside scenes, additional scenes are taken which greatly add to the fun or strength of the picture. In a recent Essanay comedy, one of our actors in the role of a jovial "drunk," with the producer and camera man, came upon a street car accident. A large coal wagon had broken down on the track and a line of blockaded cars stretched back several blocks. "Henry," the Essanay's comedy hero, was told by the producer to lift the wagon out of the way. He endeavored to do so when a city policeman dashed up on the scene, and grabbing the actor by the collar dragged him out of view. This part was unpremeditated, but it made a good scene and will appear in a coming Essanay comedy.

The Essanay Company are selling a great many posters, due mainly to the increased quality of the sheets. The Essanay posters are especially designed and made especially for the Essanay Company by the U. S. Litho. Company of Cincinnati. They can be obtained through the film exchanges, most of whom handle them, or from the Essanay Company direct, at a nominal cost. Exhibitors who have used them claim them to be box office boosters and well worth the money.

LUBIN NOTES.

In the intricate process of editing, motion picture subjects are run off over and over again until every slight defect is remedied, and the projection room operator grows very tired of the subject long after he runs it for the final O. K., but now and then he smiles when told to run an old subject, and the approving smile that illuminates the face of the Lubin operator whenever "When the cat's away" is called for argues that this farce will more than duplicate some of the past successes of the Lubin comedies. It is a roaring little laughing-play with several surprise features and plenty of spontaneous fun, set for release April 18.

"The Angel of Dawson's Claim," which forms the Lubin release for April 21, is a rarely effective child story in which a particularly clever child sustains the leading role. Most children are self-conscious in front of the camera, but this little toddler of three is as much at ease as the veteran picture player and her work possesses a charm that cannot be resisted. It is one of the most successful child pictures made in a long time.

THANHOUSER NOTES.

"Daddy's Double," the fourth Thanhouser release, is from the scenario by Lloyd F. Lonergan, of the New York World. Frank Crane, who played the male leads in "The Actor's Children," "St. Elmo," and "She's Done It Again," is Daddy in this picture, and Fred Santley the "double." Miss Daintry plays the young lady for whom Daddy and the "double" contend.

The Thanhouser version of "St. Elmo" proved a popular release and numerous "nice" notes reached the producer regarding it. One was from the Dixie Film Exchange of New Orleans and ran as follows:

"We are in receipt of the film 'St. Elmo,' and desire to congratulate you on same; if you keep up this good work you will be one of the leading producers of this country."

Until Thanhouser came on the scene the Imp films held the record for the brevity of the time between their inception and their popularity. Now that palm goes to the latest aspirant for filmy honors. Wonder who will be the next and if he can beat Thanhouser's three week's record.

Mr. Bertram Adler, of the Thanhouser Company, calls attention to the zest with which the daily papers dig down to the roots of the most nauseating crime of arson, intrigue and murder, and spread the repulsive details before the young and old in every family in the country, also the fact that in the Sunday papers are to be found columns of seductive advertisements. Yet some of these lying press association reporters add to their mischief by stating without reason or connection that "moving pictures made him do it" when anyone goes wrong. The public are no longer fooled by such innuendos, as witness the increasing attendance at the shows.

KINEMACOLOR IN AMERICA.

We learn that Kinemacolor, which was dealt with at length in The Moving Picture World last December—on the occasion of the visit from Charles Urban and G. Albert Smith—is to be directly exploited for the benefit of the American public. There has been formed the Kinemacolor Company of America with, as president, James K. Bowen, and, as general manager, Gilbert H. Aymar. It is proposed to have on office for preliminary purposes in New York City and to erect a factory and general offices at Allentown, Pa. A number of machines and subjects are already in course of shipment from England and will shortly be available for exhibition purposes in the United States. We understand from Mr. Bowen and Mr. Aymar that it is the intention of the Kinemacolor Company of America to run the process much on the same lines as it is being run in England. That is to say, it will be independent of existing moving picture businesses. In England, we may inform the reader, Kinemacolor is not seen in the ordinary moving picture theaters, but in the great variety theaters of the Hammerstein Victoria type; in other words, it appeals to the general public. Latest advices from Europe indicate that the process is attracting increased public attention under this policy and we have no doubt that if the same policy is pursued in the United States a like result will be obtained.

THE ROOSEVELT PICTURES.

The press exhibitions of the Roosevelt pictures given by William Wright, of the Kalem Company, in several of the Central and Western States have been pronounced a big success. Wherever shown exhibitors and exchange men and the newspapers generally pronounced this top notch headliner a sure big winner both for the exchanges and the exhibitors. The newspapers all over the country have accorded it considerable space, many of them devoting full-page articles to its description. From all over the United States orders are pouring in promising to break the record in number of films leased.

CHRONOPHONE PROGRESS.

The Moving Picture World has always taken a keen interest in the Gaumont Chronophone—an excellent system of synchronizing the phonograph with the moving picture that we have several times described in our pages. We are therefore glad to learn that Mr. G. K. Hartung, of the Gaumont Company, has just returned to New York from a successful four weeks' educational trip in Massachusetts. Mr. Hartung stayed two weeks in New Bedford and one week each in Taunton and Newburyport. His object was to educate exhibitors in those cities in the possibilities of the Chronophone. In that respect he was immensely successful. He had no difficulty in convincing the exhibitors of the great popular demand for singing and talking pictures, and again he was successful in training the local operators in the technical end of the work. The various moving picture houses in which the Chronophone was demonstrated were crowded with enthusiastic audiences and the trip in its educational aspects quite justified itself.

We congratulate Messrs. Gaumont on this result. We understand that they are willing for the expense of the trip to commission Mr. Hartung to give any moving picture theater exhibitor a special demonstration of the Chronophone, so as to allow the public at the various theaters to judge of the efficiency of this admirable system. The talking and the singing photograph is bound, sooner or later, to be a prominent factor in moving picture entertainments, and we therefore recommend exhibitors all over the country to grasp that fact. And not only so, but to communicate at once with Messrs. Gaumont at 126 East Twenty-fifth street, New York City, and arrange for a demonstration of the Chronophone. We ourselves have several times seen the machine in operation at the firm's New York address and have been delighted with the excellence of the phonographic end of matters and the apparent ease with which the talking and singing was made to synchronize with the picture. Writing on the subject this time last year we pointed out that the talking and singing picture was passing from the experimental into the practical stage. Gaumonts certainly have reached the latter and we cannot too strongly impress this fact upon the intelligent exhibitor who, if he will install the Chronophone in a proper and practical manner, is bound to make a success of it by attracting larger numbers of the public.

TALKING MOVING PICTURES?

By The Powers Company.

The Powers Company have just produced for the American Fotophone Company the first of the series of Talking Moving Pictures which promise to excel in every respect anything of the kind heretofore attempted in this line. The American Fotophone Company's synchronizing device is a marvelously ingenious machine which runs the Talking Machine, so that every word of the dialogue appears to come from the lips of the actors and singers in perfect time. The Moving Talking Pictures to be produced by The Powers Company for the American Fotophone Company will be complete little plays, both comedy and dramatic. The high standard of excellence in stories, staging, acting and photography already established by The Powers Company will be maintained. The photography is the work of Mr. Ludwig G. B. Erb, which is in itself a guarantee of quality. The staging of these pictures is being done by Mr. Joseph A. Golden.

ARTHUR D. JACOBS.

A Progressive Exhibitor.

One of the most intelligent exhibitors in the moving picture field is A. D. Jacobs, of the Bronx Theater, southeast corner of Wendover and Park avenues, New York City. We remember how when last year we visited Mr. Jacobs' crowded theater we found occasion to congratulate him upon the spirited and enterprising manner in which he conducted that house, situated in a crowded and cosmopolitan part of this great city. Mr. Jacobs is universally respected amongst exhibitors and the trade, and deserves his success. Recently he sent us a batch of circular literature which still further raises him in our opinion, and we desire to commend to his brother exhibitors for the excellent example which he sets them. In brief, this batch of circulars is just so many bills of the play dealing with the program of pictures day by day. As we take a glance through them we see how ingenious Mr. Jacobs is in compiling his bills. We select one at random, and here reproduce it.

It will be seen that comedy precedes grand opera and that Biograph comedy follows the opera. And then comes the always welcome Humanophone, which is very excellently rendered at the Bronx Theater. All Mr. Jacobs' programs seem to be compiled in the same careful manner. Now and again the play bill lists a headliner such as Edison's "Pardners," Biograph's "The Dancing Girl of Butte," the Pathe "Camille," "The Life of Moses," etc. Mr. Jacobs could not do his fellow exhibitors a better service than by letting them see his literature.

HALLBERG IN THE HOSPITAL.

J. H. Hallberg, of 30 Greenwich avenue, New York City, received, through the Greater New York Film Rental Co., an order from the superintendent of the Manhattan State Hospital, Ward's Island, New York City, for a complete Motiograph and Economizer equipment. On account of the great steadiness of the machine and the flickerless picture produced the Motiograph was selected as the machine best suited for the purpose. The superintendent of this institution was formerly connected with the Soldiers' Home, Bath, N. Y., where he had another make of machine, but ordered a Motiograph installed for that institution, which proved so satisfactory that the Motiograph easily won out in the test at the Manhattan State Hospital.
